The Comedia in Context

The “Golden Age” of Spain offers one of the most vibrant theatrical repertoires ever produced. At the same time that England saw the flourishing of Shakespeare on the Elizabethan stage, Spain produced prodigious talents such as Lope de Vega, Tirso de Molina, and Calderón de la Barca. Although those names may not resonate with the force of the Bard in the Anglophone world, the hundreds of entertaining, complex plays they wrote, and the stage tradition they helped develop, deserve to be better known.

The Diversifying the Classics project at UCLA brings these plays to the public by offering English versions of Hispanic classical theater. Our translations are designed to make this rich tradition accessible to students, teachers, and theater professionals. This brief introduction to the comedia in its context suggests what we might discover and create when we begin to look beyond Shakespeare.

COMEDIA AT A GLANCE

The Spanish comedia developed in the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries. As Madrid grew into a sophisticated imperial capital, the theater provided a space to perform the customs, concerns, desires, and anxieties of its citizens. Though the form was influenced by the Italian troupes that brought commedia dell’arte to Spain in the sixteenth century, the expansive corpus of the Spanish comedia includes not only comic plays, but also histories, tragedies, and tragicomedies. The varied dramatic template of the comedia is as diverse as the contemporary social sphere it reflects.

While the plays offer a range of dramatic scenarios and theatrical effects, they share structural and linguistic similarities. Roughly three thousand lines, they are usually divided into three different jornadas, or acts. Plots move quickly across time and space, without much regard for the Aristotelian unities of action, time, and place. The plays are written in verse, and employ different forms for different characters and situations: a lover may deliver an ornate sonnet in honor of the beloved, while a servant offers a shaggy-dog story in rhymed couplets. The plays’ language is designed for the ear rather than the eye, with the objective of pleasing an audience.

The comedia was performed in rectangular courtyard spaces known as corrales. Built between houses of two or three stories, the corral offered seating based on social position, including space for the nobles in the balconies, women in the cazuela, or stewpot, and mosqueteros, or groundlings, on patio benches. This cross-section of society enjoyed a truly popular art, which reflected onstage their varied social positions. A comedia performance would have included the play as well as songs, dances, and entremeses, or short comic interludes, before, after, and between the acts. As the first real commercial theater, the corral was the place where a diverse urban society found its dramatic entertainment.

WHAT’S AT STAKE ON THE COMEDIA STAGE?

Comedias offer a range of possibilities for the twenty-first century reader, actor, and audience. The plays often envision the social ambitions and conflicts of the rapidly-growing cities where they were performed, allowing a community to simultaneously witness and create a collective culture. In many comedias, the anonymity and wealth that the city affords allow the clever to transcend their social position, while wit, rather than force, frequently carries the day, creating an urban theater that itself performs urbanity. An important subset of comedias deal with topics from national history, exploring violence, state power, the role of the nobility, and religious and racial difference.

The comedia often examines social hierarchies that may be less rigid than they first appear. Whether the dominant mode of the play is comic, tragic, historical, or a mixture, its dramatic progression often depends on a balancing act of order and liberty, authority and transgression, stasis and transformation. The title of Lope de Vega’s recently rediscovered Women and Servants, in which two sisters scheme to marry the servant-men they love rather than the noblemen who woo them, makes explicit its concerns with gender and class and provides a view of what is at stake in many of the plays. Individuals disadvantaged by class or gender often challenge the social hierarchy and patriarchy by way of their own cleverness. The gracioso (comic sidekick), the barba (older male blocking figure), and the lovers appear repeatedly in these plays, and yet are often much more than stock types. At their most remarkable, they reflect larger cultural possibilities. The comedia stages the conflicting demands of desire and reputation, dramatizing the tension between our identities as they are and as we wish them to be.

Among the many forms of passion and aspiration present in the comedia, female desire and agency are central. In contrast to its English counterpart, the Spanish stage permitted actresses to play female roles, thus giving playwrights the opportunity to develop a variety of characters for them. While actresses became famous, the powerful roles they played onstage often portrayed the force of female desire. In Lope’s The Widow of Valencia, for example, the beautiful young widow Leonarda brings a masked lover into her home so as not to reveal her identity and risk her reputation or independence.

The presence of actresses, however, did not diminish the appeal of the cross-dressing plot. One of Tirso’s most famous plays, Don Gil of the Green Breeches, features Doña Juana assuming a false identity and dressing as a man in order to foil the plans of her former lover, who is also in disguise. Dizzying deceptions and the performance of identity are both dramatic techniques and thematic concerns in these plays. Gender, like class, becomes part of the structure the comedia examines and dismantles, offering a powerful reflection on how we come to be who we are.

REMAKING PLAYS IN OUR TIME

In Lope’s witty manifesto, the New Art of Making Plays in Our Time, he advises playwrights to stick to what works onstage, including plots of honor and love, strong subplots, and—whenever possible—cross-dressing. For Lope, the delight of the audience drives the process of composition, and there is little sense in a craft that does not entertain the public. Lope’s contemporaries followed this formula, developing dramas that simultaneously explore the dynamics of their society and produce spectacle. For this reason, early modern Hispanic drama remains an engaging, suspenseful, often comic—and new—art to audiences even four hundred years later.

The Diversifying the Classics project at UCLA, engaged in translation, adaptation, and outreach to promote the comedia tradition, aims to bring the entertaining spirit of Lope and his contemporaries to our work. Rather than strictly adhering to the verse forms of the plays, we seek to render the power of their language in a modern idiom; rather than limiting the drama as a historical or cultural artifact, we hope to bring out what remains vibrant for our contemporary society. Given that these vital texts merit a place onstage, we have sought to facilitate production by carefully noting entrances, exits, and asides, and by adding locations for scenes whenever possible. Although we have translated every line, we assume directors will cut as appropriate for their own productions. We hope that actors, directors, and readers will translate our work further into new productions, bringing both the social inquiry and theatrical delight of the comedia to future generations of audiences.
A Note on the Playwright

Ana Caro Mallén (ca.1601–ca.1645) spent much of her time in Seville and Madrid, the two most important cities of early modern Spain, where literature and theater thrived. For several years, she was able to make a living through her work as a playwright writing for Spain’s public playhouses and public festivities. Unfortunately, only two of her plays have survived: a chivalric story entitled El conde Partinuplés and Valor, agravio y mujer, which we translate as The Courage to Right a Woman’s Wrongs. Caro also wrote a number of other texts, including short theatrical pieces that emulate the speech of Portuguese, French, Morisco and “Guineo” or African characters, as well as narrative accounts of various political and military events.¹ We have many records of contemporary praise for Caro. She was intriguingly included in a book celebrating Famous Men of Seville, and her talent was celebrated in print by eminent playwrights and novelists of her day, such as Antonio de Castillo Solórzano and Luis Vélez de Guevara. Caro was connected with key intellectual networks in seventeenth-century Madrid and friends with the famous novelist María de Zayas, who wrote that “audiences have praised [Caro], and every great mind has crowned her with laurel and cries of victory, writing her name on the city streets.”

Besides her celebrity among contemporaries and her role as a professional writer, little was known about Caro's date of birth and family background until recently. The finding of a document concerning her baptism in 1601, which claims that she was born into slavery in Granada and was subsequently adopted by an officer of the High Court of Justice (Real Audiencia y Chancillería), makes Caro all the more intriguing, as a female dramatist who brings to the fore in her writing issues of social justice.
Introduction²

Marta Albalá Pelegrín and Rafael Jaime

Written by one of the Spanish Golden Age’s most accomplished female secular playwrights, Ana Caro’s The Courage to Right a Woman’s Wrongs is a comedy of wild intrigue and lively ingenuity in which Leonor crosses geographical boundaries and defies social expectations of gender in order to bring her fickle lover, Juan, to justice and restore her lost honor. Dressed as the dashing Leonardo, she travels from Seville to Brussels, where she finds Juan and initiates her shrewd plan for revenge. What follows is a hilarious feat of masterful maneuvering, replete with cross-dressing and unexpected twists, in which she repeatedly outwits the men around her. And while the thrill of Leonor’s efforts to seek redress culminates with the expected restoration of her honor and marriage to Juan, the questions raised by her demands for justice make the play anything but conventional. Through this stirring tale of a woman’s courage to right the wrongs she has suffered, the play holds up to scrutiny contemporary notions of masculine honor and offers in their place a vision that opens up space for women and their agency.

THE PLOT

The play opens with Estela, a countess, and her cousin Lisarda descending a mountain during a storm. Having wandered off from their hunting party, they find themselves alone when they are set upon by a group of bandits. Fortuitously, Don Juan and his servant Tomillo, who are traveling from Seville, happen upon them and manage to fend off the bandits. Once Estela and Lisarda are reunited with Don Fernando de Ribera and Prince Ludovico, both of whom long for Estela’s love, Juan is invited to join the group at the court in Brussels. Before departing with them, he lingers behind to tell Fernando how he came to be in Flanders. He reveals that he had fallen in love with a lady in Seville and courted her successfully with pledges of marriage, only to grow tired of her and leave her.

As Fernando and Juan depart, Leonor—the very woman Juan had abandoned, and Fernando’s sister—enters the stage, dressed as a man and accompanied by her servant and confidant, Ribete. (He and Tomillo both serve as the play’s graciosos, comedic servants who offer witty insights and criticism.) Leonor describes how she decided to follow Juan to Flanders to restore her lost honor—an adventure she could only accomplish in male guise. She encounters Fernando, who fails to recognize his sister, and convinces him that she is actually his cousin, Leonardo. Fernando invites her, too, to stay in Brussels, enabling her plan for revenge, which will require outwitting everyone.

Act II opens in Brussels, with Estela confiding in Lisarda about her love life. While both Juan and Ludovico court her, she cares for neither; instead, she has fallen in love with the newcomer, Leonardo. Leonor, as “Leonardo,” has set out to seduce Estela to thwart Juan’s new attempted conquest and to force him to publicly confess his wrongdoing. Once he confesses, Leonor, still in disguise, plans to force him into a duel and restore her honor through the death of her one-time lover.

Estela plans to meet Leonardo that night on the palace grounds. Leonor-as-Leonardo informs Ludovico of the meeting and offers to give up Estela, if only he will impersonate
Leonardo that night and convince Estela that she should love Ludovico instead. Leonor, using Ribete as an intermediary, then convinces Juan that Estela wants to meet him that night at her balcony. As Juan attempts to go to Estela, however, Leonor sets upon him, using the cover of darkness to hide the identity of her male persona. She accuses him of dishonorable conduct and challenges him to a duel, at least in part to waylay him long enough to prevent him from interrupting Ludovico’s meeting with Estela. Leonor leaves a confused Juan to disguise herself as Estela and meet him at Estela’s balcony. There she rejects him, and proceeds to criticize his behavior in Seville in such detail that he is left astonished and feels forced to review his old feelings for Leonor. At the same time, he is convinced that someone has betrayed his confidence by revealing so much to Estela. Meanwhile, Ludovico-as-Leonardo is unable to convince Estela of Ludovico’s appeal.

Act III begins with Juan accusing Fernando of telling Estela what had happened in Seville. Fernando rightly denies the accusation, but Juan proceeds to ask Estela herself about the identity of the informant. As no one had, in fact, told her anything, Juan’s interrogation effectively serves as a confession of the entire affair. Upon hearing this, Estela rejects him for his treatment of Leonor back in Seville. Juan then approaches Leonor-as-Leonardo and asks her to give up her pursuit of Estela. Leonor, still as Leonardo, replies that she is actually in love with Leonor and has come to Brussels to defend not just Leonor’s honor but also the dignity of love and women in general. This prompts Juan to sudden and unexpected jealousy, and a declaration that it was he who betrayed Leonor. Fernando enters and interrupts their argument, lamenting his feelings for Estela. Meanwhile, Flora—Estela’s servant and the play’s trickster— drugs Tomillo with a chocolate drink, rifles through his belongings, and steals his money. Juan, still madly jealous, returns to challenge Leonardo to a duel. Fernando discovers them with their swords drawn and prompts Juan to confess that he had dishonored a lady in Seville and that the lady was Fernando’s sister. Leonor-as-Leonardo pushes the argument to the point that Juan declares his renewed love for Leonor. She leaves and returns dressed as a lady, explaining her actions throughout the play. Repentant and humbled by Leonor’s masterful execution of her plan, Juan promises to truly marry her this time. The abandoned Estela forgives Leonor and, calling her “sister,” proposes to Fernando. Ludovico proposes to Lisarda. Estela matches Flora with Ribete. Tomillo remains alone and penniless.

CROSS-DRESSING

“This attire will enable me to recover my lost honor” (vv. 426-27), exclaims Leonor. Women dressed as men were very popular devices in Golden Age comedias. The Courage to Right a Woman’s Wrongs explores what it means for a woman to join the ranks of men, while poking fun at that theatrical construction through the play’s gracioso (Ribete), who often speaks truth to power. “You look like the god of love himself. What a dashing figure, what a well-turned leg, what a shapely foot!” (vv. 428-31), exclaims Ribete as he contemplates Leonor, in breeches and stockings, ready to avenge Don Juan’s affront. As Ribete notes, typical male attire was considered scandalous on a woman because it exposed the shape of her body, especially her legs. The exchange between Ribete and the cross-dressed Leonor must have riveted audiences at the corral. The mosqueteros standing at the pit might have enjoyed Ribete’s explicit mention of the actress’s tight clothes, while the women in the cazuela (stewpot) might have enjoyed envisioning for themselves a similar transformation, with all the possibilities that it could entail, including a challenge to male privilege in their society. The mere idea of such a transformation onstage seems to have inspired historical women. Trial records and contemporary news items tell of many women who, imitating the stories they watched at the corral, seem to have dressed as men to further engage in public life.

Although Leonor has changed her clothes, she insists that she is not just wearing a costume: “I am who I am! You are mistaken, Ribete, if you think I am a woman. The wrong done to me changed me” (vv. 471-74). Leonor claims she is not merely dressing up so she can speak in the voice of a man. Instead, she insists she has undergone a more profound internal transformation. While we might find this a strange claim, some members of the audience would have found it entirely plausible. The early modern period viewed sexual change as possible and derived from multiple causes. Ribete alludes to Ovid’s tale of the maiden Iphis, who is granted her wish to be transformed into a man thanks to the intervention of the goddess Isis (vv. 476-78). Some believed that changes in bodily temperature, great effort or pain, and other accidents might turn a woman into a man. Among the most famous examples claiming such a transformation, well illustrated in books of medicine and news broadsheets, was Elena/o de Cèspedes, who in 1587 declared before a court that s/he had become a man while giving birth to a son.

_Mujeres varonis_les_ were often described as sexually ambiguous. Leonor’s physicality as a beardless man is built on this ambiguity. Estela immediately finds Leonor/Leonardo more attractive than any other man, while the audience arguably finds her more attractive as a woman, both sexually and in her increased agency. Leonor is also presented as both logical and ethical, showing concern for her family members and adversaries alike. From the beginning, she has arranged to hide her situation from her family, scheming with her sister in a conscientious dissimulation that reveals strong female bonds and family ties. As Leonardo, she exposes a woman’s experience of the male conception of honor. She also shows up the version of manhood embodied by Prince Ludovico and Don Juan, whose values are reduced to inconsistency, egotism, and cowardice. As Robert Bayliss has noted, Leonor’s solidarity with Estela, her rival for the love of Don Juan, whom she needs to “defeat” in order to save her own honor, makes her not only “the best man of the play” but also a “better (hu)man” when compared with the men she has managed to outwit.³

OVERCOMING THE DON JUAN MYTH

Leonor’s unfaithful and inconstant lover, Don Juan de Córdoba, is Ana Caro’s re-elaboration of the Don Juan myth popularized first in folktales and then on the stage beginning with the famous Trickster of Seville (El burlador de Sevilla), a play usually attributed to Tirso de Molina. The prototypical Don Juan is a young nobleman who enjoys conquering women through ruses of all sorts. He does not hesitate to impersonate someone else, kill, or give false promises of marriage in order to enjoy the women he desires. Don Juan always grows tired of his conquests and abandons them, neither experiencing remorse nor fearing any consequences. Caro writes back to the myth by assigning doubt and fear to her Don Juan and making him virtually a parody. A playful reference announces Don Juan de Córdoba’s first appearance in Valor, as Tibaldo, one of the thieves who tries to assault Estela and Lisarda, perceives him as a devilish creature to be avoided at all costs: “Run, Astolfo. This one's a demon, not a man!” (vv. 171-72). Tibaldo’s comment echoes the dark overtones of The Trickster of Seville, in which the protagonist is ultimately killed by the ghost of one of his victims, and conjures Don Juan’s lack of pity. As in the myth, Don Juan de Córdoba comes from a noble family: the Córdobas, descendants of the Gran Capitán, a military hero who helped establish Spain’s power across Europe and especially in Italy. Like his predecessor, this Don Juan, too, is a flatterer, and an unfaithful narcissist. As he explains to Fernando, Leonor’s brother, his presence in Brussels is not entirely by choice: he is running from town to town (from Madrid, to Córdoba, to Seville, to Lisbon, to Flanders) to escape the obligations incurred in his unrelenting search for new amorous encounters. We learn that he was expelled from Madrid because of certain love affairs that got him in trouble. In Seville he abandoned Leonor, whom he had promised to marry (v. 363). After sleeping with her, Don Juan tired of their relationship and regretted his involvement, driven by what he calls his blindness (v. 366). Here, and unlike the character in the myth, Don Juan shows some sense of guilt. He deems his escape “indecorous” (v. 377) and claims to have left Seville out of shame due to his “inconstant stars,” which made him reject Leonor (vv. 373-76). Caro’s Don Juan is able to recognize his own faults. But he is ineffective when the play’s female characters get in his way. Leonor easily undoes Don Juan’s high-flying rhetoric: after he claims that a star (Leonor) has been outshone by a sun (his new love interest, Estela, vv. 1688-1702), Leonor reminds him that there was no sun on the horizon when the star was abandoned. With her own responses to Don Juan’s metaphors, Leonor outwits her lover. Perhaps most remarkably, in Caro’s version Leonor manages to make Don Juan humble himself, confess that he still loves her, and acknowledge his fault. Only then does she accept him as a husband and abandon her initial plan to kill him. In order to be reintegrated into society and love, Caro’s Don Juan must repent and take responsibility for his actions.

FEMALE SOLIDARITY

The Courage to Right a Woman’s Wrongs offers a rich tapestry of female characters bound by ties of solidarity, a counterpoint to the bonds that other contemporary plays depict among men.

Leonor consistently engages in relationships with other women. Before transforming herself into Leonardo, she concocts a ruse with her sister to hide her absence from her family (vv. 447-55).

At the court, Leonor is well aware that she might be harming another woman as she maneuvers to deceive Estela and prevent her marrying Don Juan. Yet Leonor remains determined: she pursues an outcome that is fair not only to her but also to others.

In addition to Leonor herself, other female role models populate the play, whether examples of bravery and courage such as the Amazons, the warrior Camilla, and the goddess Isis, or writers such as the ancient Argentaria, Sappho, Areta, and Blaesilla, to which Caro adds the “thousand modern women who make Italy shine with splendor” (vv. 1145-47). This praise recognizes the struggle of women writers to obtain recognition. When Ribete briefs Tomillo on the novelties of Madrid, he voices criticism that might have circulated at the time, as he notes that in Madrid poets have become so numerous that “even women want to write poetry and dare to write plays” (vv. 1137-38). Tomillo replies: “Wouldn’t they be better off sewing and spinning? Women poets!” (vv. 1139-41). By having a less thoughtful character dismiss female writers, the author denounces the idea as equally uncouth.

Finally, Leonor refrains from portraying herself as a model of female beauty. The topic seems entirely unimportant to her. When Leonardo claims that he is related to Leonor, Don Fernando immediately inquires about Leonor, whether she is well and “very beautiful” (v. 611).
Leonor-as-Leonardo avoids answering and tellingly redirects the conversation by replying:

“She’s kind and virtuous” (v. 612), prompting a validation by Don Fernando: “That’s all that matters” (v. 613).

COURTSHIP PRACTICES

Noble courtship practices in early modern Spain were an intricate negotiation between propriety and desire. A woman’s presence in public space was heavily constrained. One of the few places where women and men could see and be seen was the church, during mass. Multiple plays make reference to young people noticing each other and locking eyes at mass. As such these spaces become grounds for wooing. Suitors also made contact with their ladies by coming to their windows late at night; the men would stand below to court the women with words and even music. The Spanish even has a special word—terrero—for this space under the window.

When multiple suitors showed up to woo the same lady in the same place, as threatens to happen in Courage, the terrero becomes the stage for displays of male violence.

When out in public, noblewomen would be escorted and were expected to cover their faces with a veil and avoid eye contact with men. Of course, women could also use this convention to disguise themselves by covering their faces. In some cases this was even used as an instrument of seduction, as in the infamous tapado (literally the “cover up”—the artful placement of a mantle, veil, or other cloth over a woman’s face so no one could recognize her). We can see this play out in Courage when Don Juan sees Leonor (pretending to be Estela) at a window and fails to recognize her—not only is it dark, but she may be covering her face.
THEATER WITHIN THE THEATER

Courage shows off Caro’s deep familiarity with the comedia tradition. Her opening scene channels Calderón’s excessive baroque landscapes; Leonor’s long made-up story of seduction and revenge, which she tells as Leonardo, recalls the outsize tales told in the plays of Alarcón (vv. 633-96); and of course her very plot is a rewrite of Tirso’s The Trickster of Seville, and closely echoes his Don Gil of the Green Breeches.

The gracioso is a key figure in Golden Age comedias, and is often the one who has free rein to reconsider what is going on in the play. The Courage to Right a Woman’s Wrongs introduces not one but two graciosos: Don Juan’s servant, Tomillo, and Leonor’s servant, Ribete. This enables a double comparison, between the graciosos and their masters, and between the two graciosos. Ribete shares in both Leonor’s heroism and her transgressions. In contrast with Tomillo, who presents on a lesser scale the faults of Don Juan, Ribete is remarkably astute. In fact, he makes two key metatheatrical points that show his insight and understanding of the social mores of the play. First, he declares to an approving, cross-dressed Leonor that he cannot see why the servant of a gentleman should be a gracioso, that is, foolish and fearful, rather than a double of his master’s nobility, and notes the impropriety of comedias that require both the gracioso’s buffoonery and his intelligent intervention for a happy ending (vv. 493-537). Second, in response to Tomillo’s joking misogyny about women writers, Ribete offers a list of examples that suggest there is nothing unusual about women writing.

Indeed, women contributed to the creation of a national commercial theater in Spain even beyond acting and writing plays. Within a theatrical troupe they could rise to become directors and producers (or autoras, as they were known). At the same time, women married to printers often worked alongside their husbands and led the businesses when they were widowed. Widow-printers were remarkably prominent: in fact, one Francisca de Medina was responsible for publishing many volumes of the plays of Lope de Vega, Spain’s most famous playwright at the time.

WHY BRUSSELS?

Caro’s decision to make the court in Brussels the backdrop to her forceful vision of female agency may not at first strike one as an obvious choice. After all, the Flemish city was just one point in a vast political system whose center lay in Madrid. However, when it came to female, personal rule, the court in Brussels was exceptional.

In the period, Spain was not a single political entity but rather an association of peoples on the Iberian peninsula and beyond. With the rise of the Spanish Habsburgs, the dominion of the monarchy expanded well beyond the many “Spains” to a global empire. In the early seventeenth century, they ruled over an expansive territory that included the Iberian peninsula, what is today known as Italy, most of the Americas, the Philippines, and the Netherlands. These dominions, however, did not exist as one unified state and the power of the crown over them varied significantly from one place to another.

When the House of Habsburg split into an Austrian and a Spanish branch in 1556, the Low Countries (what we call the Netherlands) came under the dominion of the Spanish monarch Charles V. However, the Spanish monarchy’s relationship to the Low Countries was radically changed by the Dutch Revolt (1568-1648). In response to the formidable opposition to Spanish rule in the north of these territories, Phillip II transformed the Spanish Netherlands in the south into a semi-autonomous state headed by his eldest daughter, the Infanta Isabel Clara Eugenia, and her husband, Archduke Albert of Austria. The two ruled jointly over the Netherlands from 1599 until the Archduke’s death in 1621, when the Infanta became sole ruler as governor-general. Thus, from 1621 until Isabel’s own death in 1633, sovereignty in the court of Brussels belonged to a woman.

Female, personal rule in the Netherlands was not entirely unprecedented. There was, in fact, a long tradition that stretched from Margaret of Austria and Mary of Hungary—aunt and sister of Charles V, respectively—to Margaret of Parma, Charles V’s illegitimate daughter (van Wyhe 10). Yet Isabel’s power as governor-general of the Spanish Netherlands was without precedent. Unlike her female predecessors, who occupied a more symbolic role, the Infanta Isabel actually governed. As ruler of the Spanish Netherlands, she also had significant control over its military as captain-general (van Wyhe 11).

Isabel’s rule was remarkable for her deft execution of power. She presided over a tumultuous period when the vast dominion of Habsburg Spain threatened to disintegrate and had to manage the conflicting pressures for continuity and transformation. She tactfully forged “consent through reasonable argument,” and her political skill allowed her to solidify “feelings of affection and submission” crucial to the preservation of her polity (Estíngana 418). For a court in Madrid that feared losing its grip on power in the far reaches of its empire, Isabel represented a vital link to the Netherlands and helped ensure the continuity of rule.

Esteem for the Infanta Isabel in Madrid extended far beyond the royal palace. She was also celebrated in the city’s corrales de comedias, with allusions to her life and reign in the works of playwrights such as Lope de Vega. Though there is no explicit mention of Isabel in Courage, there is a strong sense that the play is paying homage to a woman who, like Leonor, journeyed to Brussels and prevailed in an undertaking often reserved to men. In her martial prowess and masterful maneuvering, it is almost as though Leonor becomes the embodiment of the dual roles the Infanta played as sovereign: the captain-general and governor-general of Flanders. References to a certain “Highness” (su Alteza) whose identity is never made clear appear throughout the play. However, it does at one point mention the “Infanta” (v. 545). The Courage to Right a Woman’s Wrongs is, after all, a play that consistently questions traditional gender roles and affirms the authority and agency of women through references to female characters in myth or to female authors. Brussels, therefore, is more than just a backdrop for Leonor’s adventure. Instead, it represents a privileged space for female agency.

PRODUCTION HISTORY

Unlike for other dramatic works by Ana Caro, we have no evidence of seventeenth-century performances of The Courage to Right a Woman’s Wrongs. Two manuscripts are preserved in the National Library of Madrid, one from the seventeenth and one from the eighteenth century. The play was also printed around the late seventeenth century and again in the early eighteenth century in Seville, where it seems to have had a greater reception and was most likely performed.

In the last twenty years, the comedy has been performed by professional theater companies in the United States. In 2006, Gala Hispanic Theatre staged Valor, agravio y mujer in Washington D.C. The play was directed and adapted by Hugo Medrano, who transposed the action to the nineteenth century. In 2017-2019, the New York City company Repertorio Español staged the play in a production directed by Leyma López.

In Spain, the 42nd edition of the Festival of Almagro included a production directed by Verónica Clausich, on 9-10 July 2019. In 2018 an adaptation by Ana Castrojuan, entitled Loco desatino, was staged in Pamplona's Teatro Gayarre. The adaptation imagined Ana Caro writing the third act of The Courage to Right a Woman's Wrongs over the course of a sleepless night.

ABOUT THIS TRANSLATION

This translation is based on two critical editions, by Lola Luna (1993) and María José Delgado (1998). There are two extant manuscripts of the play, each with different textual gaps. In order to fill these, we compared the editions of the two manuscripts. Ana Caro’s title also has interesting gaps, in this case deliberate. The modular title simply juxtaposes “courage, wrong, woman.” Any translation must fill in the relationships between these terms. Our title emphasizes Leonor’s agency, ideally capturing the spirit of the play.

This translation includes emotional interjections and exclamations in Spanish as optional lines where the meaning can be inferred from the context of the dialogue or an actor's performance. These moments are marked with a forward slash between the English translation and its Spanish equivalent in italics, and include Spanish punctuation where appropriate.

ACT I

On both sides of the stage are stairs covered in myrtle branches, like mountain trails, to the top of the set. Down one of these come ESTELA and LISARDA, dressed for the hunt, with short spears. Thunder and stormy winds accompany their descent.

LISARDA This way, my brave Estela. This path will see us down from the remote mountain—this proud giant who challenges the stars—to the valley below, til the heavens turn merciful and temper their harsh blows, unfurrowing their knitted brows. Follow me, cousin!

They slowly descend as they speak

ESTELA Which way? I am frozen through! Cursèd be my ambition, a thousand times over, and that fleeing deer who dashed my hopes, wounded my pride and evaded my fateful blow! Though its swift flight encouraged my pursuit, I now quake in its footsteps. Oh, heavens / ¡Válgame el cielo! See how the crystal spheres jolt the planets from their orbits!5 How the turbulent heavens, full of terror and wonder,

5 The Ptolemaic system imagined concentric spheres surrounding the earth, around which the planets completed their orbits.
stage Phaeton’s fall anew!
See how, as their axes shudder,
all balance is undone!
See how the elements,
angry and disordered,
hail down upon us,
amid deafening thunder and icy air!
See how Aeolus, god of the winds, angrily releases them
from their stout prison, so that once freed
they might make the earth tremble, sending prodigious tremors through its very womb.
See Heaven’s blue pavilions al dressed in mourning, while the dark and pregnant clouds, who delivered this violence
now abort lightning bolts!
All is surging fear,
al is duress and hardship,
al is fright and affliction,
al is pain and wonder.
The dark clouds extend beyond the furthest horizon.
What shall we do?

LISARDA  Don’t worry.

ESTELA  Fear has turned me to stone, Lisarda.
For me to take to the woods like this!

They make their way down to the first level of the stage

LISARDA  We’ll find refuge together from the inclement weather.
Come under these oaks, Estela,

6 In Greek mythology, Phaeton, son of Helios, the sun god, insisted on driving his father’s chariot across the sky. Unable to control the horses, he died in a fiery crash.

7 Greek god of the winds. The original Spanish gives Noto and Boreas (gods of south and north winds, respectively) as the winds released to unleash the storm. Ana Caro is echoing a famous storm in Virgil’s Aeneid.
till Heaven comes to our aid. See, the sun is finally breaking through those clouds in the west.

They move to one side of the stage. Enter the bandits TIBALDO, RUFINO and ASTOLFO

TIBALDO Some bandits we are, by God! / ¡por Dios!
We hardly deserve the name. Misfortune or idleness has turned every last one of us into maidens at their needlework. Just look at us lying about—the warlike discipline of Mars himself? A proud sight indeed.

RUFINO Spare me. We’re short on chances, not on courage!

TIBALDO Well, seek them out then!

ASTOLFO By God, if I’m not mistaken, fortune has just delivered a fine chance into our hands!

TIBALDO May Heaven let us enjoy it!

ASTOLFO Two fine-looking women, talking to each other. Can’t you hear them?

TIBALDO Let’s approach them nicely.

ESTELA Lisarda, do you see those three men over there?

LISARDA Yes, they’re headed our way.

ESTELA Oh, thank heavens! / ¡Gracias al cielo! Gentlemen, is it far from here to the house of Enrique, Count of Belflor?

TIBALDO It is very close.
ESTELA Could you tell us how to get there?

TIBALDO Come with us.

ESTELA Your courtesy is the lodestar that guides us on our way.

RUFINO (Aside) Before long, there will be fear and trembling to wreck your calm instead.

The bandits lead the ladies offstage, while Don JUAN de Córdoba, very elegant in his traveling clothes, descends along the path opposite the one the women took.

JUAN Confusion everywhere! An earthquake so sudden, A storm so immense! I’ve lost my way, it seems. Will I be fortunate enough to find a guide? These mountains are so solitary…

He walks down to the first level of the stage

Tie the mules to a tree, Tomillo, and come down to this meadow while they graze.

TOMILLO, from above, without coming down

TOMILLO What meadow? Tigers, rhinoceri, crocodiles, alligators, the cyclops Polyphemus,8 damned souls and devils, (God forgive me) will come for you there.

JUAN What are you going on about, you fool?

TOMILLO I say you must pay

8 A reference to the man-eating giant in Homer’s Odyssey.
for the sacrilege you committed in abandoning such an angel!

JUAN   Has anyone ever seen such foolishness?   115

TOMILLO  How can anything go well for us, when you—

JUAN   Don’t make me angry.
Enough of your nonsense.

TOMILLO  Oh, that’s good.
So now the truth is nonsense?

JUAN   Listen! I hear muffled voices.

TOMILLO  Perhaps it’s a satyr or a faun.9

Enter the bandits with the ladies. In order to tie their hands, they put down their pistols and cloaks; JUAN remains to the side

TIBALDO  With your permission, or without it!

LISARDA  What is it you want, you barbarians!  125

ASTOLFO  It’s nothing. Don’t get upset, or it will go worse.

TOMILLO  They must have just come down from the mountains.

JUAN   Listen to them!

TOMILLO  What should I listen to?
Is this some new passing skit, full of enchantments
and adventures in the woods, where I play Sancho, you Don Quijote, and we go looking for the inn,  135

9 Satyr / Faun: Mythological creatures that were half-man, half-goat and associated mischief and lust.
the wenches, and the beatings?\textsuperscript{10}

\textbf{JUAN} It is indeed a pretty pass, and one that requires me to measure my pride against their daring.

\textbf{TOMILLO} Don’t rush in, my lord.

\textbf{TIBALDO} Take their jewels now.

\textbf{ESTELA} Take them, you traitors, and leave us be. Ay, Lisarda!

\textbf{JUAN} Do you not see, Tomillo, these two suns so wrongfully eclipsed? Do you not see their glow diminished, and barbarously overshadowed?

\textbf{TOMILLO} Come back down to earth. These are highwaymen and if they discover us they’ll have us for dinner. They’ll make mincemeat of us, before we can even say confession.

\textbf{JUAN} I must show who I am.

\textbf{LISARDA} Kill us, oh ungrateful men!

\textbf{RUFINO} That’s not what we’re after, my queen.

\textbf{ESTELA} How can the heavens withhold their mercy now?

\textbf{JUAN} \textit{jumps in front of them with his sword drawn, upsetting the bandits. Meanwhile, TOMILLO takes the coats and the guns and heads into the forest.}

\textbf{JUAN} Well, what is it you want? To taste the wrath of my arm and my sword?

\textsuperscript{10} The first readers of Miguel de Cervantes’ \textit{Don Quijote} (1605, 1615) regarded it as a funny book, particularly for its opening episodes, full of confusion and violence. The specific reference here is to one of Don Quijote’s first adventures, when he confuses an inn for a castle and Maritornes the serving-girl for a princess.
ESTELA    Oh, who could resist him!

JUAN      You low cowards!

TOMILLO   Though I’m quaking with fear, I’ve got their weapons here, which will at least make things 165
a little less dangerous.

TIBALDO  Fire, Rufino!

RUFINO   Where are the pistols?

TOMILLO  Pickles, maybe?

ASTOLFO  There’s no time to lose. 170

TIBALDO  Run, Astolfo!
This one’s a demon, not a man!

RUFINO   Run, Tibaldo!

The bandits exit, with JUAN in pursuit

TOMILLO  By God, I swear my master 175 is giving them a run for their money, no beating around the bush—
he beats them into the bushes!
Jesus, what a chase!

ESTELA    Ay, Lisarda!

LISARDA  Dear Estela, take heart! 180
The heavens are looking out for us now.

Enter Don FERNANDO de Ribera, GODOFRE, captain of the guard, and others

FERNANDO  Where can they be, Godofre? 185
What enchanted forest or labyrinth conceals them?
(Sees ESTELA and LISARDA) But wait, what is this?

ESTELA    Ay, Don Fernando!
We’ve been at fortune’s mercy…
FERNANDO What happened? How?

LISARDA Horrible bandits captured us…

FERNANDO Could there be any greater misfortune?

He unties them

LISARDA But a noble gentleman saved us.

Enter JUAN

JUAN Now they’ll get their just deserts, those barbarians who dared defy your heavenly beauties so rudely, and failed to honor your fair hands.

FERNANDO takes out his sword

FERNANDO Die!

ESTELA Wait, Fernando, and do not prove ungrateful. This is the man to whom we owe our life and our honor.

FERNANDO Let me kneel at your feet, and excuse my ignorance.

TOMILLO And what should I do, sit here twiddling my thumbs while these witnesses, for and against, fail to declare just how bold I was?

FERNANDO I will reward you.

FERNANDO gives TOMILLO a bag of coins

JUAN Off you go, you fool. Now your valor is repaid.

ESTELA Tell me your name and origin, if you will, unless there's reason not to. Let me know to whom I owe so much. I am obliged to serve you and it will be my pleasure to do so.

FERNANDO I ask the same of you, and if by chance I may be of any help at the court in Brussels, I am at your service. Not only in the name of the Countess, whom I serve, but because it is my nature. Come with me, and whatever you wish I will happily provide.

TOMILLO May you live longer than a thousand Methuselahs. What a good lad!

LISARDA We are all the more in your debt and so must beg of you to tell us who you are.

JUAN It would be my pleasure.

FERNANDO (Aside) What a gallant! What a gentleman!

JUAN I was born in that city celebrated for its antiquity as mother of all wits, origin of letters, splendor of scholarship, archive of sciences, epitome of courage, and center of nobility. It was the happy birthplace of Seneca and Lucan:

11 Biblical patriarch said to have lived 969 years. The original text invokes Nestor, an old wise king who fought with the Greeks at Troy.

12 Caro praises the city of Córdoba, naming individuals associated with the city's fame to highlight its nobility: philosophers and writers of Roman Antiquity, such as Lucan and Seneca the Elder and the Younger; Roman public figures, such as the senator Anneus Gallius and the priest Rufus; famous Spanish poets, such as Juan de Mena, Enrique de Villena, and Luis de Góngora. Villena was believed to have conducted necromantic experiments, including forming a cloud and making it rain. Martial, although not from Córdoba, was often thought to be associated with the city.
one a Stoic philosopher,
the other a celebrated poet. And also another Seneca, whose tragedies teach virtuous morals,
and his brother Anneus Gallio, renowned for his oratory. And this is not even to mention the famous Castilian poet, Juan de Mena, and that generous Marquis, Don Enrique de Villena, who probed the stars
and the science of numbers, whose deeds arouse wonder even if time has obscured them.

Birthplace too of Rufus, and even of Martial (though this is disputed).
I am from that city, in short,
where the poet Góngora was born, rare prodigy of the world. His wit enriched the Castilian tongue with clever phrasing and sweet conceits.
I was born in Córdoba, monument to Roman pride, adorned by the Betis, that river whose overflowing waters kiss its ramparts in homage to the ancient glory of its founder the Roman Marcellus. I inherited the noble blood of the Córdobas, a name that embodies all the excellence of Spain.
I spent my tender youth at the court in Madrid in search of favor, which never ends well. I was driven away by envy, that many-headed Hydra that refuses to die, and sent into exile over certain encounters— mere trysts, in effect! I was favored, but not enough to save me from misplaced loves. And so I returned home very much against my will. I was used to greater things. It's not easy to get over a fall from favor, you know. And so, to distract myself, I set out for Seville. There my kin received me with open arms, and I found comfort in their noble house. I amused myself as best I could in that magnificent city: its palace, its orchards, its river, its market, its promenades, its cathedral—an eighth wonder of the world, most famous and most beautiful. And so…

Enter Prince LUDOVICO and companions

LUDOVICO (To his companions) Don Fernando de Ribera, here? (To FERNANDO) My friend!

FERNANDO What news, my prince?

LUDOVICO I’m here with Fisberto and Lucindo, and also Duke Liseno. We were charged with looking everywhere for Lisarda and Estela, and told not to return without them. Since they are with you now, and have found refuge from the weather, let them not delay their return. In that sheltered valley a chariot awaits, with an escort of gentlemen and servants.

14 In Greco-Roman mythology, a water monster with many heads that inhabited one of the entrances to the Underworld.
ESTELA  Let us go, then. But make sure that gentleman comes with us.

FERNANDO  I see how it is.

ESTELA  (Aside) He never finished his story! 315

FERNANDO  Countess, the prince will lead you on to the chariot, and we will follow in an instant.

ESTELA  I hate to go, Lisarda, without hearing the end of the story. 320

LISARDA  You will hear it in good time.

The women exit with LUDOVICO, TOMILLO and companions

FERNANDO  My friend, a mysterious force draws me to you, some natural inclination or sympathetic star. Come with me to Brussels. 325

JUAN  I would be honored.

FERNANDO  While they walk ahead and we follow at our leisure, why don't you finish your story? 330

I beg of you, tell me, what brings you to Flanders?

JUAN  (Aside) What luck that the prince came for Estela just then. My soul has surrendered to her beauty and I would hardly want her to hear the rest of my story. (Aloud) As I was saying, Fernando, while I was seeking solace in Seville, I saw a woman in church one Tuesday in May, the Day of the Cross, 340 which I now carry on my back.15 Her great beauty was the talk of the town.
I will not describe her,
for it would only add weight to my chains.
Even if I hated her,
to call her an angel would not overstate her charms.
To see her was to love her.
I found out her house, her family,
her state and condition, and, satisfied with it all,
swayed her from her virtue, pressed her to indiscretions and plied her with promises.
She looked kindly upon me,
and a go-between was found to help me enjoy her favors—if, indeed, there is joy in such trespasses.
I promised to take her as my wife.
I need not say more—
you can infer the rest.
I was blinded. She was so tender, so beautiful, so clever,
open to pleasures besides,
taking displeasures in stride.
And yet her fate, her unlucky star,
undid any obligations incurred, justified though they might have been.16
I followed the path,
if not of my fate,
then of my inconstant stars.
Weary and full of regret, somewhat indecorously,
without a word or a goodbye,
I soon left for Lisbon, annoyed at those changeable stars that now made me despise her.

15 Day of the Cross: the religious festival of la Cruz de Mayo. Don Juan pokes fun at his current situation when he imagines himself carrying as a cross on his shoulders the heavy burden of seeing a lady in church.

16 Juan uses the passive voice to deflect responsibility from himself.
After traveling through France and England
I finally arrived in this land,
at the court in Brussels,
where my soul feels at home,
recalling the glories of Madrid.
It’s too bad this truce with Holland keeps me from turning to arms to distract myself from all this.\textsuperscript{17}
And yet, since I have your favor now could you put in a word on my behalf, so that I might occupy myself at court until my funds make their way to Flanders?
I am Don Juan de Córdoba, from Andalucia. You, a Ribera, and my noble countryman.
Now that we’ve met like this we must stick together to show the courage of Spanish noblemen, the valor of Andalucia.
This is my story. Now, you who share my birthplace,
and also my nobility,
honor me as is your duty.

FERNANDO
It is my honor to meet you, Don Juan, and I only wish my means could match my devotion.
I am drawn to your great courage
by some mysterious force.
I’ll see that her Highness here in Brussels\textsuperscript{18} honors Estela’s obligation to you, and what all of us owe you.
Meanwhile, my house and all I own are at your disposal.

\textsuperscript{17} The play takes place during a brief truce in the Eighty Years’ War (1568-1648), also known as the war of Dutch independence, in which the Netherlands fought a protracted and bloody war against Spain. Juan’s reflection on the truce further confirms his self-centeredness.

\textsuperscript{18} Brussels was part of the Spanish Netherlands. From 1598 to 1621, these territories were ruled by Philip II’s daughter Clara Eugenia and her husband Archduke Albert VII of Austria (Clara Eugenia continued as Governor from his death in 1621 until 1633). A long period of peace and prosperity in the early years of the 17\textsuperscript{th} century allowed the arts to flourish at the court in Brussels. Though we do not know when Ana Caro’s play was written, and though there is little information to date the action precisely, it is possible to imagine her writing about a space ruled by a woman as the context in which Leonor can right the wrongs done to her.
Let us go together to the princess. She will reward you, and so my obligations will be satisfied.

JUAN By God, how can I ever thank you for such favors!

FERNANDO Come.

Enter TOMILLO

TOMILLO My lord, the mules await.

FERNANDO And the carriage?

TOMILLO Maybe it’s chasing Apollo’s chariot across the skies? Either way, it hasn’t made it through the forest.19

Exit all

Enter LEONOR, dressed gallantly as a man, and RIBETE, her servant

LEONOR This attire will enable me to recover my lost honor.

RIBETE You look like the god of love himself. What a dashing figure, what a well-turned leg, what a shapely foot!20 For a noblewoman of such tender years, you have shown great daring.

LEONOR When passion rules, lovers lose all sense. But I am not led by love. Spurred by the wrongs done to me, I instead follow reason.

---

19 In Greek mythology, Apollo or Phoebus is the god of the sun. He travels around the sphere of the world carrying the sun in his horse carriage.

20 Part of the appeal of cross-dressing plots in this period was that the actresses would be wearing form-fitting, leg-revealing costumes. Ribete here is emphasizing the eroticism of the cross-dressed lady.
amid the blows of my unyielding fate.
All for that first moment of weakness, when my faculties were overcome!
I discovered that ingrate—the one who repaid
my love with disregard, my faith with cruelty—
was on his way to Flanders.
And so I announced
I would enter a monastery to keep my family from looking for me.
No one would come see me, no one except my sister, and she knows the truth.
In fact, she’ll pretend to visit me to maintain the ruse.
It may be a mad plan, but at least no one else will ever learn the truth.
I made up my mind and bravely crossed the sea to accomplish my purpose or to die in the attempt.
By the heavens above, I will be a new Amazon, a courageous Camilla,21 and avenge myself on this treacherous liar.

RIBETE Listen to you, by God!
I do believe your new attire has given you a new spirit.

LEONOR I am who I am!
You are mistaken, Ribete, if you think I am a woman.
The wrong done to me changed me.

RIBETE Wrongs can lead to strange metamorphoses.
You did more than Ovid’s Iphis

21 A fierce female warrior in Virgil’s Aeneid.
by transforming yourself into a man.
You were your own goddess!22
Anyway, back to our purpose here:
will you kill him, then? 480

LEONOR  I will kill him, by God! / ¡vive Dios!

RIBETE  Seriously?

LEONOR  I swear on God’s name!

RIBETE  Still swearing?
Shame on you.

LEONOR  You’re wasting your breath.

RIBETE  Well, you know your typical Don Juan is always on the move, like some kind of new Magellan.23 490

LEONOR  Be quiet, fool.

RIBETE  Oh please.
Must I play the coward?
Couldn’t I be the brave servant?

LEONOR  Is that what’s bothering you? 495

RIBETE  Why must servants always be hungry cowards, and play the fool?
Can’t a man be born daring
even if he is not born noble?
What? Couldn’t the servant be twice as brave as his master? 500

LEONOR  Well said.

22 Ribete alludes to a tale in Ovid’s Metamorphoses, in which the maiden Iphis is transformed into a man thanks to the intervention of the goddess Isis.

23 Here and in the following speech, Ribete shows his awareness of other stories. He is referencing the larger legend of Don Juan in other plays, including Tirso’s The Trickster of Seville. Magellan famously circumnavigated the globe—the implication is that Don Juan travels from place to place to seduce women.
There’s a reason I chose you as my friend and not my servant.

RIBETE  Ribete of Seville is at your side, so fierce that he thought nothing of taking on three at once, as he planted his bloody flag amid the green banners of war. But on to the living: what will you do now?

LEONOR  Ribete, we must find my brother, or everything will be lost.

RIBETE  And if he recognizes you?

LEONOR  Impossible. I was only six years old when he left. He won’t remember my face. As long as he takes me in, my courage will avenge my wrongs.

RIBETE  So now you’re Don Leonardo, some newfangled Lord Ponce de León?24

LEONOR  Yes, that’s my name now.

RIBETE  Oh master, and how the women will be pestering me, with their love letters to you! Just like in a play, where the fool is the go-between and must take care of everything. There’s no plot, no scene, where a servant with good taste won’t come in handy. Without him, there goes Troy!25 Is there anything more delicious

24 Juan Ponce de León (POHN-SHE DEH LEH-OHN) was a conquistador famous for his quest for the fountain of youth.

25 There is a tradition from classical literature to the early modern period that the city of Troy was undermined by scheming. Ribete is referencing this in connection to the archetypical scheming servant in comedia, the gracioso.
than when a servant yokes together
the stables and the court, or makes a fierce thundering king laugh at his wild antics?

LEONOR There are people coming.
Come this way.

Enter FERNANDO and LUDOVICO, talking

FERNANDO …And that is what I wanted to tell you.

LUDOVICO I am amazed!

FERNANDO Don Juan de Córdoba’s brave courage is even more worthy of admiration than his luck, although he certainly is fortunate.
The Infanta favors him for his bravery.
Indeed, he is now her steward.

LEONOR Ay Ribete!

LUDOVICO He well deserves it.
And tell me, does Estela now favor Don Juan?

FERNANDO I believe so.
Her gratitude affords him that rare satisfaction.

The two speak aside

LEONOR Don Juan de Córdoba!
Oh God / ¡Ay Dios, that’s what he said!
Could it be that ingrate, here today?
I can hardly disguise my dismay.

FERNANDO But I will speak to her on your behalf.

LUDOVICO Can Estela aspire to anything more?
Her wealth, her beauty, who better to bestow them upon than me?

FERNANDO Well said.

LUDOVICO Is there in all of Flanders a man more handsome, more gentlemanly?

RIBETE (Aside) I’ll be damned.

FERNANDO Leave this matter to me.

LUDOVICO Agreed. Just make sure, as you are my friend, that it all comes to a good end.

Exit LUDOVICO

FERNANDO What a nuisance!

LEONOR Ribete, I want to approach him and ask about my brother.

RIBETE Would he know him?

LEONOR Of course.

FERNANDO May I help you with something, gentleman?

LEONOR No, sir; I would just like to inquire about a captain.

FERNANDO A captain? What’s his name?

LEONOR takes out some letters

LEONOR These will say:
Don Fernando de Ribera, Master of the Horse and Captain of the Guard for Her Highness.

FERNANDO (Aside) How dashing! Could those letters be from Leonor?
(Aloud) I stand here before you.
Give me those papers.

LEONOR  Oh, what luck!

FERNANDO  Are they from my sister?

LEONOR  You will recognize her hand.
(Aside) Ribete, I’m so nervous.

FERNANDO  reads while LEONOR and RIBETE  speak aside

RIBETE  Why?

LEONOR  At seeing my brother.

RIBETE  Is this the famous courage of Seville?

LEONOR  Well said.
I must find my courage today for the sake of my honor if I am to restore its luster.
For without honor,
even gold is vile.

FERNANDO  I’ve read this letter, Don Leonardo, and it simply asks that I favor you.
Your presence alone would have sufficed,
yet my sister requests it,
and, obliged to her, I will honor her wishes for your sake, for hers, and for mine.
How is she?

LEONOR  She misses you, of course.

FERNANDO  Is she very beautiful?

LEONOR  She’s kind and virtuous.

FERNANDO  That’s all that matters.
And the youngest sister, Laurencia?
LEONOR  She’s precious!
      A little flower,
      an angel in human form.

FERNANDO  Tell me, by my life,
      what brings you to Flanders?

LEONOR  I can barely bring myself to speak, overwhelmed as I am by your courtesy.
      Though it’s true that my gratitude would seem to require an answer.

FERNANDO  You’re too kind.

LEONOR  Oh, worthy scion of the Riberas!
      To respond to your generous concern,
      I will tell you of my harsh fortune, only now turned kind in bringing me to you.
      I need not tell you of my distinguished line:
      the mark of its nobility is my pride in being related to you.

They embrace

I served a lady whom the heavens\textsuperscript{26} graced with all beauty.
My soul secretly enjoyed her favors, finding glory in our sleepless nights.
Though I faced a powerful rival,
I was hardly worried.
Don’t be surprised: my Anarda is as faithful as she is beautiful.
The Marquis Ricardo made bold to show everyone he served my lady.
But I am not one to lose my courage.
Instead, I added fuel to his jealous flame.
Rich and handsome, he became willing to risk his reputation.

\textsuperscript{26} Leonor’s elaborate lie echoes the hyperbolic embellishment of Alarcón’s famous liar, Don García in \textit{La verdad sospechosa}, which is the basis of Corneille’s \textit{Le menteur}.
Presuming in vain, and with little tact,
he caused such jealousy and strife,
he lost his good name, once intact.
One night among many,
I found him at Anarda’s door,
his vain hopes withering as they bloomed.
His presence set my sword on fire,
so that on my own I pushed not just him,
but two others, off her street.
He pretended nothing had happened,
but one day, when we were playing tennis, and deciding who’d serve first,
he shouted, in a sudden rage,
“You pack of liars, the lot of you!”
and at that, I lost my head.
One of my hands found his face while the other beat back a furious attack.
That was it for the game. On each side all broke out into civil war, while I landed outsized blows and made my rival kiss the dirt.
One attempts to make peace, while another furiously closes in—
in the end, between the avenged and the insulted, one man lay dead and three wounded.
Ricardo, scorned by my lady
so many times, and jealous, if not of me, then of my fortune, wastes no time in seeking his revenge.
Offended, he rallies friends and relatives, making a grand show of his injury,
as only such a coward would.
Let us just say,
his fierce rage gave way to violence, so that the best remedy seemed to be to put ground between us and absent myself from my dear homeland.
In fact, I had to leave in haste,
for he could seek his revenge at leisure, and it never would be treachery,
since I had injured him first.
My uncle prepared me for my journey.
Before I embarked, he gave to me this ring, a rich remembrance of Victoria, his beautiful and noble daughter. I traversed the cerulean expanses of Amphitrite’s briny deep,\(^{27}\) unencumbered by storms, and, with this fair wind at my back, my hopes now land at your feet.

FERNANDO I was so pleased to see you, and now your story has amazed me. Don’t worry about our homeland, for you will find in my breast the loyalty of a relative, the kindness of a friend, the love of a brother. Indeed, I could not care for Leonor more than I do for you. I had given this ring to my lovely cousin Victoria—may God keep her in His glory—just before I left Spain. Although it lends you credence, the truth is you do not need any such proof with me. In fact, I welcome the occasion of your unfortunate quarrel, for it has brought you to me.

LEONOR There is a reason your good name is renowned the world over.

FERNANDO Don Leonardo, you are my brother.

LEONOR (Aside) What courtesy! He’s a Ribera, I see. The apple doesn’t fall far from the tree.

FERNANDO We’ll put you up with Don Juan de Córdoba.

\(^{27}\) Amphitrite: In Greek mythology, Poseidon’s wife and queen of the sea.
LEONOR Who is that?

FERNANDO Who? A fine gentleman from Córdoba.

LEONOR It would be neither fitting nor, indeed, courteous if my own comfort came at this nobleman’s expense.

FERNANDO Don Juan has a separate room. Her Highness honors him for his great valor.

LEONOR (Aside) What’s this I hear? (Aloud) Is he a person of refinement?

FERNANDO He certainly cuts a fine figure and is affable enough, although inconstant, it must be said: a lady from Seville he misled, seduced, and then abandoned. Now he adores Estela, Countess of Sora. She is very beautiful, but in my opinion nothing can excuse such a fickle change of heart.

LEONOR (Aside) Take courage, my highest hopes! (Aloud) It’s not always the man’s fault.

FERNANDO Yet he has often spoken of Leonor’s thousand good qualities.

LEONOR And yet he hates her now?

FERNANDO Love makes even the eagle-eyed blind. When the Countess is around he can’t see straight.

LEONOR (Aside) How cruel! / ¡Ay cruel!

28 Although Fernando knows that Don Juan has abandoned a woman in Seville named Leonor, he does not make the connection to his own sister.
(Aloud) And does she return his feelings?

FERNANDO She is grateful to him, friendly and courteous. She could do no less given his brave action on her behalf. You’ll hear of it soon enough. Fineo!

Enter FINEO

FINEO Yes, sir.

FERNANDO Prepare Don Leonardo’s room for him at once.

LEONOR (Aside, angry) This is killing me!

RIBETE (Aside) Hush, Leonor.

FERNANDO Put him in Don Juan’s quarters.

FINEO Straight away, sir.

FERNANDO Come, Leonardo.

LEONOR I’ll be right in.

FERNANDO I will await you in Her Highness’s room.

FERNANDO and FINEO exit on opposite sides of the stage

RIBETE (Aside) There goes the show! Is anyone listening? Hello, hey! If he’s embarked on a new romance maybe it’s time for us to do the same and head for home. Here comes the lightning, the tempests, the trials, the vipers, the basilisks.²⁹ what will come next?

I expect she’s thinking of what havoc she can wreak now, like a true Amazon.30

(Aloud) Oh, my lady!
With whom do I have the pleasure of speaking?

LEONOR Leave me, you fool!

She cuffs RIBETE

RIBETE Beelzebub! What else can I call you?
You’re giving the devil a run for his money!
Who do you take me for, Don Juan?
Where did that come from!
That was quite a wallop!

LEONOR Go away! Leave me be!

RIBETE exits

When, oh when, oh Heavens will you rain down your fury upon him?
When will there be consequences?
Where has justice fled?
Where has it gone?
How can it cover up such iniquity as this?
Justice undoes itself

Does your arm lie useless and idle?
How can you suffer

ACT II

Enter ESTELA and LISARDA

LISARDA What do you think of Don Juan, Estela?

ESTELA He seems fine.

LISARDA He’s such a gentleman, so gallant.
He deserves every attention.
He was so dashing, so spirited, 870
so proud, so brave!

ESTELA I would expect him to be handsome and graceful if you find him to your liking.

LISARDA You flatter me, cousin.
And what of the prince? 875

ESTELA Nothing pains me more than the sound of his name.
May the heavens spare me 880 his attentions!

LISARDA (Aside) May love reward
my yearning heart.

ESTELA What a horrible man!
LISARDA  So you really don’t like him?

ESTELA  No.

LISARDA  Don Leonardo, on the other hand, deserves your love. He’s so handsome and clever.

ESTELA  It’s happened so fast, cousin. I can’t ignore what I feel for him. In this short time, he’s caused me such heartache so many sleepless nights. And yet I owe Don Juan my gratitude for his attentions. But this gallant Adonis, this Spanish phoenix, this new Ganymede, this youthful god of love, this Narcissus, this sun! The sight of him has so changed me there is no room in my heart for even the memory of a former love.

LISARDA  A change indeed!

ESTELA  It’s true, I confess. Yet since I’ve never shown another favor, there is hardly any fault in my falling for him now.

LISARDA  And so, he may seek his happiness.

ESTELA  My own, you mean.

Enter FERNANDO, LEONOR, and RIBETE

FERNANDO  Beautiful Estela, Prince Ludovico

32 Phoenix: Mythological bird that was reborn from its own ashes, also a term often used to refer positively to extraordinary people; Adonis, Ganymede, Narcissus: beautiful, and mostly ill-fated, young men in Greek mythology. These references emphasize Leonor’s androgynous erotic appeal in contrast to the men in the play.
has asked me to come to you.
Yet Don Juan is my friend, and I know he would lay his very soul at your feet, just as I humbly kneel before you now…
(Aside) How can I do this?
Oh God! / ¡Por Dios! How can I say this to her?
(To ESTELA) I beg of you—

ESTELA  What you beg of me matters little, Don Fernando, when I have no desire to choose.

FERNANDO  That’s enough for me.

ESTELA  Do not speak to me of Don Juan or Prince Ludovico.

FERNANDO  (Aside) Her disdain is music to my ears!
Now I can act on my own love!

LEONOR  (Aside) She hates Don Juan!
What luck!

ESTELA  And you, Don Leonardo, have you nothing to say to me
after so many days away?
I cannot believe you behave this way, ignoring all the rules of courtesy and your obligations as a gentleman!

FERNANDO  Since you will not decide, I bid you farewell.

ESTELA  Goodbye, then.

FERNANDO  And you, Leonardo, will you stay?

LEONOR  Yes, cousin.

ESTELA  Fernando, tell both of them for me, that I am not in love
nor do I plan to marry.

Exit FERNANDO
LEONOR

My silence, beautiful Estela, speaks volumes without saying a word: silent adoration is a language all its own. Already I have confessed what only eyes such as yours could have caused in me, those twin shining lights offer peace and serenity amid the raging storm, and sweetness when all is false. Yours is an arresting beauty, a bold charm, and a confident glance. Who but you could be so cruel and yet so merciful? Who else bestows punishment and reward, life and death? Who overcomes the will, disturbs peace of mind, rules over pleasure, reigns over volition? Who else but you? Who else but you could rule over all she beholds like the sun or a god? While you stand aloof, suitors surrender to a sweet death. Pain is pleasure, cruelty alluring, suffering irresistible. What else but your imperious beauty could command this delicious torture? The more my soul surrenders to the mercy of those eyes, the more it suffers, the more it is deceived. My soul comes humbly to seek mercy at your fair hand. Yet reflected in the crystal of your flashing eyes, it turns away, disabused and ashamed, 985 for those eyes captivate the will, 990 and steal all freedom, flaunting their crimes, flattering with their cruelty,
and making death seem worthwhile.
So wise and so lovely,
yet so cold in your courtesy, reserved in your praise, 995 sensible in your whims, virtuous in your beauty.
Yet there is no blaming you for, mysterious as a goddess, you devastate with your loveliness.
What would mar another,
no matter how lovely,
is cause for praise in you.
Only you can wound at will and delight those you kill. 1000 Change my pain into pleasure.
If my love is worthy,
let me be your humble servant
for if your eyes were to deny me their fortune and favor, 1005 their cruel mercy,
where else could my soul turn?

RIBETE 1010
(Aside) On earth as it is in heaven, for ever and ever, amen!
That’s some poetry Leonor spouted!
It’s not too bad.
At least her verse is penetrating, since she won’t be able to go as deep with her prose…

ESTELA 1020
Don Leonardo, that’s quite enough of your sweet words. I suspect you are playing the nightingale, who sings, not out of love or a jealous heart,
all yearning and lovelorn,
but simply for his love of song.
I value your courtesies,
and were I assured of your love,
I would grant you my favor.

LEONOR

My love will prove itself in time, but you are not wrong to compare my affection to the nightingale’s song.
When sweetly and sincerely
he sets his music stand above the jasmine or the rosebush to sing welcome to the day, it is you he greets, celestial dawn,
for your eyes are two suns and your beauty, the sky.
Would not any nightingale
sing when beholding you, Would not he grieve
when you are gone?

ESTELA

How glib is your tongue!
But enough, Leonardo, no more.
Tonight, in the courtyard, beneath my window, I wish to speak to you alone.

LEONOR

My soul shall fly to obey you.

ESTELA

Goodbye, then.

LEONOR

Goodbye. I am at your command, lovely Lisarda.

LISARDA

I will see you later.

ESTELA

Very well.

Exit ESTELA and LISARDA

LEONOR

How was that, Ribete?

---

33 In the original, the space beneath a woman’s window is called “terrero” – see introduction on courtship in the comedia.
RIBETE  It seems my prediction is unfolding nicely.
Estela, blinded by love, imagines she can coax fire from damp wood and two cold stones.
How could a great fire of love be struck,
even if she’s hot for you,
when you’ve got no wood to burn?

LEONOR  Love is on my side.
Here comes the prince.
See how vain he looks!
But I need his friendship.

RIBETE  A real gem!

Enter LUDOVICO

LUDOVICO  Don Leonardo!

LEONOR  My prince! It’s been so long since I last saw you.

LUDOVICO  You do such credit to our friendship.

LEONOR  By your life, I swear—

LUDOVICO  Enough! What is there to swear about?

LEONOR  How are things with Estela?

LUDOVICO  How are things?
Fernando spoke to her and she told him with such scorn that I ought to leave her alone, that she “does not love the prince”
or “plans to marry.”
I’m vexed by her slight,
I tell you, as my interest in her is plain for all to see.
LEONOR  We’re friends, are we not? 1085

LUDOVICO  Who but you deserves to know the truth of my love?

LEONOR  There is much we need to discuss.

RIBETE  (Aside) Watch what you’re doing.

LEONOR  This is a matter of great importance. 1090
Listen: Estela has declared herself to me, but for your sake I will not love her, not if my life were at stake, for moments like these are the test of true friendship. 1095
I’d prefer you to possess the favor she would give me.
And so that you may win her, you must go to the courtyard tonight to speak with her, pretending you are me.

LUDOVICO  What are you saying?

LEONOR  You must grant me this favor. Come, I’ll tell you the rest.

Exit LUDOVICO and LEONOR

RIBETE  What’s Leonor doing? 1105
But she’s a woman—what wouldn’t she attempt? Even the most proper of women has a touch of the devil about her.

TOMILLO  Good God! I can’t find Don Juan anywhere! 1110

RIBETE  (Aside) That’s the buffoon who means to deflower Flora—(Aloud) Have the town crier call for him, as they do in Spain.
TOMILLO  My countryman!
How it warms the cockles of my heart to think I see other Spaniards!

RIBETE  It’s a natural feeling towards one’s countrymen.

TOMILLO  You serve Don Fernando, don’t you?

RIBETE  That’s right.
I’m a servant of his cousin, Don Leonardo.
Anything else?

TOMILLO  How’s the pay?

RIBETE  He pays in advance.

TOMILLO  And he feeds you?

RIBETE  Whatever I want.

TOMILLO  It’s not like that here.
Where are you from?

RIBETE  Madrid.

TOMILLO  How long have you been here?

RIBETE  Far too long! It’s been six months.

TOMILLO  And what is new in Madrid?

RIBETE  Everything there is old hat.
The only new thing is the poets and only because there are so many of them.
Even women want to write poetry and dare to write plays.

TOMILLO  God spare me! / ¡Válgame Dios! Wouldn’t they be better off sewing and spinning?

Women poets!
RIBETE  Oh yes!
But it’s not as new as you think,
when there's Argentaria, Sappho, Areta, Blaesilla, and the thousand modern women who make Italy shine with splendor today,34 making up for the boldness of their new vanity.

TOMILLO   And tell me—

RIBETE  Christ Almighty
that’s a lot of questions!

Exit TOMILLO and RIBETE, and enter JUAN alone.

JUAN   There is such turmoil in my breast, such passion in my soul!
I can find no rest,
as this life takes its  bitter toll.
Though I relish each sleepless turn,
I shiver and I burn at this love.
There is such pain in this pleasure, this jealousy that wracks me is hell in different form.
To what end did chance have that lady cross my path, if the lady I now love is the one I’ll never have?
Sweet Estela is well aware,
of my love and obligation
but what of it, if she dithers, she takes no risks, offers no care?
She is snow to my hot fire,
a moth drawn to another flame.
Neither love nor hope frighten me—for good fortune remains elusive
when I await such a reward.
This Leonardo, cousin to Don Fernando, is now my gallant rival in love.

34 Famous intellectual women from antiquity: Argentaria was said to have assisted her husband, the Roman poet Lucan, with one of his great works; Sappho was a lyric poet in ancient Greece; Areta was a Greek philosopher; Blaesilla was the daughter of Saint Paula.
And yet, I am amazed for his voice, face, figure, and name are so similar to Leonor’s.
For who if not one who is Leonor’s very copy, could indeed have spoiled such an agreeable match with Estela?
Leonor, though she is absent,
still haunts my imagination,
and knows just how to thwart me.
My desire frustrated, it is as if Leonor had come from Spain just to get in my way.
The prince serves Estela, and she—fickle as she is—dotes on his friend Leonardo.
I, like the last soldier on the watch, am left out in the cold, while unease consumes my favors and my sorrows—
my breast, an ardent volcano, my soul, an Etna of fire.\(^{35}\)
A poet once said:
“He who loves more, deserves more,”\(^{36}\) and so I must love, for I believe there is merit to my suit.
Let Fortune’s chosen one receive the laurel branch, though if love were enjoyed without merit,
then unearned pleasure would be all that Fortune brought.

Enter RIBETE

RIBETE (Aside) How these blind endeavors weigh upon Leonor!
Yet who can hope to see when the blind lead the blind?\(^{37}\)

\(^{35}\) Mt. Etna, a volcano in Sicily.

\(^{37}\) A reference to Cupid, often depicted wearing a blindfold.
I am to give Don Juan this letter as though it were from Estela. Since love keeps Leonor awake, she is taking steps, using tricks against tricks, and ploys against ploys. Ah, there he is! How happy I will make him.

JUAN Must I love without reward, and conquer without a prize?

RIBETE Fortune calls to you now with a happy task. Read this letter.

JUAN What is this latest misfortune?

RIBETE It’s from Estela, Countess of Sora, by the grace of God.

JUAN I shall kiss this letter a thousand times, for it is hers. Let me read it.

RIBETE (Aside) Read. I’m sure it will be all spark and no fire.

JUAN reads

What good fortune! Now, perhaps, I’ll have my prize, born of firm resolve, and not of simple luck. I’ve overcome the disdain of the beautiful Estela. She calls to me at last! Come, oh joy, not too fast lest I die of delight in such glory, when all my sorrows could not kill me.

RIBETE That’s just it.
JUAN  Take this chain—
     I wish I could give you the world.
     Oh, sweet letter!  1245

RIBETE  (Aside) I’m sure there’s less to it than he thinks.

JUAN  Am I dreaming or awake?
     Do I dare answer?
     It will be my great pleasure to obey her, my friend.
     Tell the one who owns my heart that I am hers.  1255

RIBETE  Goodbye, then.

JUAN  And to you.
     We must speak again—
     I’m sure we will be great friends.

RIBETE  But of course!  1260

RIBETE exits

JUAN  Hurry on, Apollo’s fiery chariot, make room for the night,
     whose darkness follows your flight.38
     Today my hope will try its luck, for Estela herself urges me on.
     Though the prize might take some time, these high hopes are worth far more than any humble conquest.  1265

JUAN exits, and LEONOR enters, cloaked39

LEONOR  Oh, where do I wander in my madness, impelled by the savage force of love?
     How, in all its blindness,

38 Reference to the sun coach driven by Apollo, Greek god of the sun.

39 In original comedia productions, red cloaks were worn to indicate that a scene took place at night.
against impossible odds, can it still persuade me that I will triumph? 1275
Oh Honor, how you grieve me, play with me, offend me!
If only Ribete would come so I might know whether he was able to give the letter to that ingrate for whom I risk so much.
But here he comes:
what news, Ribete?

RIBETE enters

RIBETE  Well, I’m here. I gave the note to that sweet angel, 1285 who gave me this shiny trinket, thinking the letter was from Estela.
He told me to deliver it to the one who has his heart, and to say he is hers,
and will come speak to her soon.

LEONOR  Very well.

RIBETE  Have you made up your mind?

LEONOR  This night will bring me either resolution or death. 1295

RIBETE  Be careful, Leonor.

LEONOR  There’s no other course.

RIBETE  God, I hope you don’t muck everything up.

LEONOR  You don’t know my courage! 1300

RIBETE  Who says you’re a coward?
Just look at you now,
so brave, so quick, so proud,
so daring, and, in short,
another Mars in everyone’s eyes;\textsuperscript{40} whose boldness alone wreaks havoc far and wide. And yet, my lady, where is the strength to match it?

LEONOR What of the heroic Semiramis? What of Zenobia, Drusilla, Draznes, Camilla,\textsuperscript{41} and a thousand like them? Did they not set an example for a thousand famous men? Besides, Ribete, I have to find him first. I am only here this early to give the prince time to see Estela without running into Don Juan.

RIBETE Take courage, then, for you are here now and those are the Countess’s windows up there. She spoke to me right here the other day.

LEONOR Make sure the keys Fineo gave you are waiting for me where I said, Ribete.

RIBETE Very well. The ones to the room next to Estela’s? The one with balconies to the other side of the palace, which lies empty now?

LEONOR Yes, and wait for me where we agreed, with one of my gowns. My life depends on it.

RIBETE No, I should stay here

\textsuperscript{40} Roman god of war.

\textsuperscript{41} Semiramis: queen regent of the Assyrian Empire from 811 to 806 BCE; Zenobia: also known as Septimia Zenobia, she was the queen of the Palmyrene Empire in Syria during the third century AD; Drusilla: probably Livia Drusilla, advisor and wife to the Roman emperor Augustus, though Caro could also be referring to Julia Drusilla, sister and lover of the Roman emperor Caligula; Draznes: obscure reference.
to defend you,
in case Don Juan—

LEONOR    Oh, what nonsense, my friend!
I know my own strength.

RIBETE    If you know your own strength, then so be it, my lady. Goodbye.

RIBETE exits

LEONOR    I came early, in case
Don Juan cannot sleep and is around too.
May God delay Prince Ludovico in case Juan shows up.

Enter JUAN

JUAN    I was right to fear there’d be someone here.
It’s one man alone—
I must find out who he is.

LEONOR    That is a fine figure of a man.
Could it be Don Juan?
I must get closer and find out who he is.

JUAN    If he would just say something,
I would know if he is the prince.

JUAN and LEONOR walk toward each other

LEONOR    I must speak to him and settle this once and for all.
Who goes there?

JUAN    One who goes where he pleases.

LEONOR    (Aside) It’s him. A fine response!
(Aloud) Well, he won’t pass unless I allow it.
JUAN   Who are you to get in my way?

LEONOR  The devil.  1365

JUAN   The devil? Nicely played!
I’m not afraid of a devil.

LEONOR  I am like a hundred, thousand, million devils
when I get angry.  1370

JUAN   That’s quite a legion!

LEONOR  Are you mocking me?

JUAN   How could one man defend himself from so many?
And so I humbly ask you—if devils listen to that sort of thing—that you send them away.
What on earth could they want here?
(Aside) So insolent—he should be glad he found me just as I awaited
the chance to speak to Estela.  1380

LEONOR  In fact, they’d like to rain sorrows on ingrates such as you.

JUAN   And if I won’t let them?  1385

LEONOR  Won’t you?

JUAN   Those are feisty devils!
Settle down, my man.

LEONOR  And you are very ill-mannered.
Either you let me stay here,
or we’ll have to fight.
You choose.
JUAN Have you gone mad? I’ve been very patient in putting up with such nonsense, but this is no small matter. It’d be too bad to have to kill you, but to leave would be even worse. Men like me are never swayed by petty insults such as these. Besides, I have given my word to hold this place for a friend.

LEONOR Well, if men such as you kept their word on weightier matters, as both reason and justice demand, there’d be no need for revenge. Why do people even give their word when they don’t know how to keep it? Is that fitting? Is that fine? Is that polite? Is that nice?

JUAN (Aside) This is no lark—he clearly takes me for one who’s offended him. Best to leave him in the dark. (Aloud) I do not understand you, by God! / ¡por Dios vivo!

LEONOR Well, I understand myself just fine. And it should be clear that I know you, since you know that I speak the truth.

JUAN Your boldness shows such courage and such daring, I find myself growing fond of you.

LEONOR Your fond feelings are in vain. This is not the first time that you have grown fond of me, but it was always a fiction, since you are treacherous, fickle, false, faithless, deceitful, duplicitous, savage, godless, unjust, ungrateful, and untrue to your word.

JUAN Look, I have given no one cause to speak against me this way, 1430 and yet here you are, spewing accusations I don’t understand.

LEONOR You don’t understand, you fickle man? Did you not feign, promise, plead, oblige, persuade, and pledge, swear by the faith and word of a nobleman, and then, betraying your blood, honor, and obligation, flee at the first chance, disdain with no reason, and leave without a goodbye?

JUAN You’re mistaken.

LEONOR I had better be mistaken. A great man for an escape, you are!

JUAN The rays of the sun would lose their light before I’d fail to keep my word.

LEONOR Well, look: I know one who knows full well you gave your word. You made a solemn promise never to break it, and as soon as your desire was satisfied, it was all over.

JUAN You are mistaken.

LEONOR I had better be mistaken.

JUAN I do not understand you.

LEONOR I do.

JUAN Listen to me—
LEONOR  I want to hear no more falsehoods from those lips of yours.
They will only lie again.

JUAN  Consider—.

LEONOR  I’ll consider nothing.
How considerate were you?
Draw your sword.

JUAN  Neither my sense nor my courage can let this pass any longer.
There is no other way out.

They begin to fight and LUDOVICO enters

LUDOVICO  Don Leonardo told me to wait here for Estela.
I suspect she is late.

JUAN  I have tried to be patient and polite, since you clearly take me for another man,
but you seem determined to fight.

LUDOVICO  A fight, here!

LEONOR  Most disloyal of men,
I know you well.

JUAN  Well, then,
let’s fight!

They fight

LUDOVICO  That’s Don Juan. Oh Fortune, finish off my rival!
I can kill him
if I just help his enemy.

LUDOVICO moves to fight at LEONOR’s side

I’m on your side!
Let the villain die!
LEONOR                      He will not.

She moves to JUAN’s side

My courage will save him from a thousand deaths.

JUAN                         What’s this? 1490

LUDOVICO              You defend the one who offends you?

LEONOR  I may want him alive.

JUAN                         What is this, by God?
Such a sudden change? 1495

LUDOVICO             If only someone would kill Don Juan!

LEONOR                   It won’t be easy, not when I defend him.

LEONOR fights LUDOVICO

LUDOVICO         Such terrible blows!

LUDOVICO steps back

LEONOR That’s better.
This is not your business.
Leave, sir,
before it costs you.

LUDOVICO (Aside) That’s the first reasonable thing he has said.
They have not recognized me.
I should go now,
and not leave Estela waiting.

LUDOVICO retreats with LEONOR chasing him offstage LEONOR That’s more like it.

JUAN That was brave and gallant.
(Aside) By heavens! / ¡Válgame el cielo! What is this?
For this man to provoke me,
and with his sword allow fury to triumph over reason!
He wished me dead, yet in a moment
he came to my defense.
I would never have imagined such a thing.
He might want me alive, he said.
He bravely challenged me to fight,
then resisted the one who attacked me.
I do not understand.

LEONOR Ah, he’s gone.
Let’s resume our fight.

JUAN What is all this obliging and offending me, by God?
I won’t fight you, sir, which is proof enough that I am grateful.

LEONOR You think my coming to your aid was some sort of great favor?
You could not be more wrong!
Offended as I am,
I want no other to partake of my glorious revenge.
It would not be my victory
if another’s courage were to deprive me of my triumph.
I want no one’s help: my revenge would be less memorable then.
No, my happiness depends on killing you myself.

JUAN If someone has offended you,
and you believe it was me,
then you are sorely deceived.
LEONOR I may have been deceived once, but no longer. 1545

JUAN Then tell me who you are.

LEONOR One who treats me so poorly has no right to ask. The man I chased away was Prince Ludovico. He will soon be back and I don’t want to see him. You may stay—I don’t care. And if I provoked you earlier, I had good reason to do so. 1555

JUAN Who are you? Tell me.

LEONOR I won’t. Rest assured, we'll settle this soon enough.

JUAN Listen. Hear me out. 1560

LEONOR It is not possible. I will find you. This is enough for now.

Exit LEONOR

JUAN By God, I will follow him, if only to confirm that he knows it was me he spoke to. Who could know what I did? 1565

Exit JUAN. Enter ESTELA at the window

ESTELA What takes Leonardo so long? He must be waiting for things to quiet down at the palace, or perhaps he is detained in someone else’s arms. May love prove me wrong. What to do with myself? Oh, could that be him now? 1575 LUDOVICO Good lord! / ¡Válgame el cielo! Where is Leonardo going at this hour? I heard him talking to someone.

ESTELA Is that Leonardo?

LUDOVICO (Aside) I will pretend to be Leonardo. (Aloud) I am your slave, to my great good fortune.

ESTELA I was worried you wouldn’t come.

LUDOVICO Then I am happy I was late.

ESTELA Why?

LUDOVICO Because it made you worry about me, most beautiful Estela.

ESTELA What kept you so long?

LUDOVICO I was gambling.

ESTELA Did you win?

LUDOVICO I did.

ESTELA Give me my share.

LUDOVICO What is left to give, when I am all yours?

ESTELA You are just making excuses. Come closer, listen.

LUDOVICO Gladly!

Enter LEONOR, above, dressed as a woman

LEONOR If only I can speak to him, it will be a perfect ploy, for once “Estela” dashes his hopes he must cease his attempts…

JUAN

Oh, to have followed him and then to have lost him on the way back from the palace!

LEONOR
(Aside) This is Don Juan.
Go slowly, Love, slowly, for tonight in your game I shall either lose myself or win it all.

JUAN

Ah, here is Estela, surely.

LEONOR

Who is that?

JUAN

A lost soldier on the lookout in the war of love.

LEONOR

Brave soldier!
Is it Don Juan?

JUAN

The very one who has surrendered his entire soul to you:
memory, will, and intellect,
with far more pleasure than pain.
I have no faculties left with which to act, no reason to judge, and no strength to fight.
All is subject to you, Estela.

LEONOR

What? Do you love me so?

JUAN

You are clever enough to realize when you look in the mirror—could anyone help but love you?

LEONOR

Though it’s true I was once vain enough to pursue a dubious passion,
I can’t trust the mirror.
JUAN         It must be a dark glass…

LEONOR       Don Juan, sir,
             I don’t need you to praise my image.
             I only wish you were less of an ingrate.

JUAN         I, an ingrate?
             By heaven, if I do not love you,
             then let me die in the attempt!

LEONOR       What? Don’t you know me better than that?
             Let’s get to the point.
             Why should I believe you?
             Doña Leonor, the lady from Seville, was neither foolish, ugly, poor, lowly, or rustic, was she?
             And yet you know, you ingrate, how you toyed with her honor despite her sincere devotion.

JUAN         What Leonor? What lady?

LEONOR       Come closer. Listen.
             There is always some truth to rumor.
             I know reputations do not lie.

JUAN         (Aside) Don Fernando has given me away!

JUAN and LEONOR continue speaking while the action moves to LUDOVICO and ESTELA.
The scene switches continually between the two couples.

LUDOVICO     I am your slave, of that I’m certain, but not whether you pine for me, beautiful Estela.
             (Aside) I must find out if she favors Leonardo.
             (Aloud) I know that prince Ludovico is dying for the love of you.
             He is rich, noble, royal, in fact.
             And although love pays no heed to distinctions such as these,
             I cannot possibly prevail against him.

ESTELA       I find him tiresome, arrogant, pretentious, in fact.
I cannot stand to hear his name.

LUDOVICO
(Aside) Oh, ingrate, my love is clearly more deserving!

The action switches back to LEONOR and JUAN

LEONOR
So many pretty words.
You confess your love, then.

JUAN
I do confess it.

LEONOR
So then you betrayed her?

JUAN
It is true that I loved her,
but know this: I did not offend her honor.

LEONOR
You are so fickle, Don Juan.
Were you able to forget her without having enjoyed her?

JUAN
Only your beauty is to blame for that.

LEONOR
My beauty? That is a pretty excuse!
If you must always love the next beautiful woman,
you will only trade one for another.

JUAN
Listen, please!

Action switches back to ESTELA and LUDOVICO

ESTELA
(Aside) I will show off my wit.

LUDOVICO
What of Don Juan?

ESTELA
I don’t like him.
Nothing could persuade me to love him.
I love only you.

LUDOVICO
That will drive me to desperation.

JUAN
(Aside) For Estela to know of this!
I must be mad!
LEONOR  Speak, Don Juan, speak.

JUAN  Hear me out:  Like one who sees the morning star gild the horizon before dawn and cannot but love its shining glow, only to call it dim once he sees the sun rises pure and bright to illuminate the sky, so it was for me. I worshipped in Leonor the lovely fire of a star. I was a moth to her flame. But once I’d glimpsed in you the shining likeness of the sun I saw my previous love was but shadows and flickering light. Leonor is a fading star, and you a resplendent sun.

LUDOVICO  I know well that Don Juan has a claim on your affection.

ESTELA  I would be lying if I denied it, and yet it was… Hear me out.

LUDOVICO  Speak.

ESTELA  Allow me to explain, Leonardo. As one who in a shady grove or garden comes upon a pure, fragrant, lovely field of flowers of every possible color, and is drawn by the beauty of the rose, only to then find a more delicate jasmine, and so must leave the rose behind, so it was for me. I saw Don Juan, a handsome rose, and out of gratitude accepted him as my suitor.

Then, at the sight of you,
all my senses drawn to you,
I chose what I found most beautiful.
For though I may esteem the rose,
I find in you, the jasmine,
a more fragrant delight.

LEONOR
So Leonor was just a twinkling star, announcing the sun to come?

JUAN
That’s right.

LEONOR
(Aside) This is tearing me apart!
(Aloud) Listen—

JUAN
I am all ears.

LEONOR
The wandering traveler treasures the pure light of the morning star
in the darkness of the night.
It alone brightens the path and offers him hope.
And so, though the sun’s rays might finally reach him, he remains grateful to the star,
that beacon in the storm.
Leonor was the star that led the way through the dark night of your love.
She was your guide, and you, ingrate that you are, forgot the spark of its beautiful light long before you fell for my radiance.
Had you not forsaken the star long before you saw the sun?

LUDOVICO
That’s a strange metaphor, Estela, to compare a rose to Don Juan’s courage and gallantry.

ESTELA
Not so.
LUDOVICO  But listen:
he wasn’t wise who, among the flowers,
preferred the jasmine to the rose.
Its perfume does not last once it starts to wither.
The rose maintains a strong sweet smell, fragrant to the very end, so that even in death one may call it beautiful.
The rose is, indeed, the better flower.
The jasmine is not as fine.
Presented with rose and jasmine, you welcome the brief splendor of the jasmine, its fragrant snow, which the spring wind will blow away.
But then once you see the coveted rose,
its proud, beautiful grace you’ll surely prefer it to my love.
The jasmine is but a lowly flower.
The rose is full of fragrance.

JUAN  A nice bit of sophistry!

LEONOR  Forgive me. I must say what I feel.
Go, go on back to Spain.
An honorable man should not deign to deceive such a noble woman.

JUAN  My love for you redoubles my feelings of disdain. I’ve forgotten her, yet this is the reward I get.

LEONOR  Then lose all hope, Don Juan.
I only wanted to see you
in order to disabuse you.

Exit LEONOR

ESTELA  You make such easy wordplay of my pain, Don Leonardo!
Yet I’ll be firm in my affection.
Nothing will stop me from loving you.
LUDOVICO Whether a jasmine or a rose, I will merit fortune’s crown. 1790

ESTELA Farewell. Dawn is breaking now, clear and radiant. 1795

Exit ESTELA

LUDOVICO Stay, for your eyes rival the sun. 1795

ESTELA More flattery! Look for me later, and farewell.

JUAN How could Estela respond like that? How could she be so disdainful? My heart pounds as though it would leave the prison of my breast. My battling desires will cost me my very life. Foolish thoughts afflict my soul, lost in doubt and chaos. Don Fernando is to blame. What should I do now, ungrateful Estela?

LUDOVICO Though you may now offend, ungrateful Estela, my ploys will win you in the end if love will not do the trick. 1810

Exit LUDOVICO

JUAN But, why do I falter? Where is my courage, my strength? I’ll follow this amorous deed through to the end. I will love the Countess Estela. I’ll stand firm against all others. My unrivaled affection will overcome her disdain.
I will treasure her denials as my greatest favors.
Estela’s fury and anger,
her hatred and loathing,
her tepid reception,
her brutal rejection,
all conspire against me.
Let my life end here,
amid all this pain.
Yet if Fortune favors the bold,
I’ll hazard my life,
and a torment so brief.
Bold and daring,
and firm in my purpose,
I’ll stand up to her fickleness.

Exit JUAN

ACT III

Enter FERNANDO, JUAN, and TOMILLO

FERNANDO  I would give my life to satisfy your doubt.
I, speak to Estela?
May I die by my own sword
if I—

JUAN  All right, Don Fernando.
May the one who ruined my happiness and led to such trouble be cursed a thousand times over!
I believe what you say, but, by God there is no one else in Flanders who knows my story.

FERNANDO  Neither my honor,
nor my noble devotion to you,
would ever allow me to say a word.

JUAN  You have wronged me,
and this adds insult to injury.
Not knowing who speaks of my past so carelessly is a slow torture.
I am losing my mind!
How my fears and woes afflict me!

FERNANDO Here comes Estela.

JUAN My anxious soul has been longing for her.
Say nothing.

FERNANDO Beautiful Estela,
lovely Lisarda,
the dawn breaks late today, for here are the sun and the sunrise walking side by side.

LISARDA A new hyperbole.

JUAN Hardly new, for Estela is always a radiant sun, and you a shining dawn.

ESTELA That’s quite enough, Don Juan.
How many times must I acknowledge your courage and your courtesy?

JUAN It is my misfortune never to please you.
Instead you reproach me,
so aloof and ungrateful.

ESTELA No, Don Juan.
Ungrateful, no. But perhaps less than sensible in my courtesy to you.

JUAN Your good sense is killing me.

ESTELA I’m eternally obliged to you, Don Juan, and may God make me
worthy of your courtesy.
It is my every wish to repay your affection.

JUAN      A change for the better, Don Fernando!

FERNANDO  See how wrong you’ve been?
(Aside) I must prevail today.

JUAN      Tell me —by your life!—
          a single truth.

ESTELA    Ask away.

JUAN      Will you answer?

ESTELA    Yes, by my life!

JUAN      Who told you that in Spain
          I once served, wooed, and enjoyed Doña Leonor, a lady from Seville?

ESTELA    Who? You yourself.

JUAN      I did? When?

ESTELA    Just now! Didn’t your words awake me from my ignorance a moment ago?

JUAN      And before that, who?

ESTELA    No one, on my word.

JUAN      Then why were you so angry at me when we spoke at your window last night?

ESTELA    Are you hearing this, Lisarda?
          Don Juan says I spoke to him.

LISARDA   He is clearly confused.

JUAN      Confused? Didn’t you say that I won the love of a lady from Seville?

ESTELA

Don Juan, that’s quite enough. This is the first I’ve heard of it, upon my honor! I haven’t said a word about this to you, not at my window, nor below it.

JUAN

(Aside) Heavens above / ¡Vive el cielo! I’m crazy! Estela is clearly in love with me, but wants to hide it from Don Fernando and Lisarda. Though I wonder why she now denies that she said those very things to me. Oh love! To arms, to arms! Loving thoughts, we must return to the fray. See how Estela encourages our sweet hopes this day! I will pretend. (Aloud) Forgive me, it was a jest, to pass the time.

FERNANDO

That was quite the joke, true, but I think it’s on you.

LISARDA

Was your lady very beautiful, Don Juan? Because the women of Seville are famed for their beauty.

JUAN

It was all a jest, by God!

ESTELA

It was no jest for her, Don Juan. She was deceived.

JUAN

No, by my faith! (Aside) Who could imagine such a thing? Oh, love! What is happening to me? Estela now favors me, now dismisses me, insulted by my courtship. She encourages me, then disabuses me, denies that she would choose me,
then turns kind and agreeable once more.
And I never tire of adoring her in the face of her unceasing changes, her stormy disposition.

FERNANDO
Heaven knows how truly
I appreciate your good will,
given how fond I am…
of Don Juan.
(Aside) If only the lovely Estela could read between the lines
how much I care for her!
(Aloud) And so I ask, for his sake, that you honor him.
(Aside) Oh, friendship, what you ask of me!

ESTELA
I will speak with you later, Don Fernando.
Don Juan, you should strive to keep your word to ladies.

JUAN
You wrong me unjustly, lovely Estela.

ESTELA
Leonor was the one wronged.

JUAN
(Aside) I must not let on that I know what she speaks of.
Estela’s had enough of me today.
(Aloud) Fernando, let’s go.

FERNANDO
How angry you’ve made her! Come.
Goodbye, ladies.

ESTELA
Goodbye.

Exit FERNANDO and JUAN

Have you ever heard a juicier tale?

LISARDA
What is this, cousin?

ESTELA
I don’t know—by my life! Just wait.
You can’t keep these things from a woman. Call Tomillo.
He’ll tell us the truth.

LISARDA You’re right. Tomillo!

Enter TOMILLO

TOMILLO How can I serve you?

ESTELA Tell me the truth about something,
and this purse is yours.

She offers TOMILLO a purse

TOMILLO (Aside) I’ve got a truth for her.
Go on, ask me.

ESTELA Tell me, who was this Leonor from Seville, whom Don Juan knew so well?

TOMILLO Who? Oh yes, oh yes! Silly me.
It was little Nora the streetwalker.
She sold her wares in Frogtown, and also passed false coins.\textsuperscript{43}
You must mean the one whose house
Don Juan used to visit, right?

ESTELA Yes, perhaps that’s it.

TOMILLO (Aside) How easily she’s deceived!

ESTELA Who was this woman?

TOMILLO Not a woman at all,
she was more of a monster!
Her forehead was wide,
her cheeks all sunken, with bristling brows.

\textsuperscript{43} Tomillo fabricates a story to both protect his master, Don Juan, and to benefit from Estela’s offer of payment. This scene refers back to Tirso’s Don Juan, who is fond of boasting about his dealings with whores.
ESTELA I’ll congratulate him on his catch.

LISARDA (Aside) I’ll go along with this. (Aloud) And did he love her?

TOMILLO I don’t know. I only know that she bragged about being his.

ESTELA Can you believe such a man?

TOMILLO You are surprised? Don’t you know that he finds any woman beautiful?

ESTELA You are right. Here comes Leonardo.

TOMILLO (Aside) I played that hand well.

Exit TOMILLO. Enter LEONOR dressed as a man

LEONOR I searched in vain inside my heart, oh lovely Estela, but I was not there. My heart encouraged me to dare, and to seek in you my best part. I dared not hope, then fear took hold, yet at last humility conquered fear. And when at last the truth made bold, my love rendered it all quite clear. And so I sought myself in you, proving the paradox, you see: I could not find myself in me, but yet I found myself in you.

ESTELA Leonardo, you know it isn’t much to say my eyes reflect your image true, for that mirror comes from my love for you, not your own pretensions of love as such. To better your conceit and make it sound, instead say love finds me within your eyes.

44 Estela comments on Leonardo/Leonor’s clumsy use of Neoplatonic love theory. Leonor’s reply tries to amend for her mistake in a way that sounds simultaneously pedantic and amusing.
rather than finding yourself in my guise, so that I’m missing, nowhere to be found. Clearly you have no real memory of me nor space for myself in all that is thine. If you loved me full well I’d surely be in your remembrance as you are in mine.

LEONOR

Though your sweet lips may have let fall a belief so misguided, in all fact whatsoever the lover does at all moves the beloved in that very act. When Love lights a true fire in your heart, it is the beloved’s breath that fans it, and as it mingles with your breath in part, you live to see love advance it. I carry you within my heart, so dear, I cannot believe I deserve to be carried within you, as you are in me, ‘til I see myself in your eyes appear.

ESTELA

In short: you’re not yourself without me.

LEONOR

I will never deserve you, and so my love will never know the satisfaction of knowing you love me.

ESTELA

And is love so suspicious?

LISARDA

Love must be wise.

LEONOR

There will be no satisfaction in your loving me, given my qualities.

ESTELA

That is most unfair! Your merits should give you hope. I will go to the park this afternoon. Follow the carriage.

LEONOR

I will obey.

ESTELA

Then goodbye.
Exit ESTELA and LISARDA

LEONOR May God keep you, amid such misfortunes and pain
as clearly lie ahead.
I find danger to be certain,
with no solution at hand.
Alas! What should I do next?
Love undoes all attempts to right my wrong.

JUAN (Aside) Yes, Leonardo was here.
The force of my desire has conjured him.

LEONOR (Aside) For him to love another while I’m humiliated?
Not a chance! I would die first!

JUAN Don Leonardo, sir—

LEONOR My friend—(Aside) If only you were more than that!
But you are fickle as all men.
(Aloud) What can I do for you?

JUAN I need your help.
Listen: I have come to you,
as you are a nobleman,
to beg of you,
as you are a gentleman,
to ask of you—

LEONOR (Aside) Oh, you traitor!
You have greater claims on me,
if only you would recognize them.

JUAN My lord, I'll make my case brief, and state it once and for all,
because Estela encourages me.
The Countess—

LEONOR Good start!
Go on.

JUAN

As I was saying, Countess Estela, following her inclination, or perhaps in light of my outsize courage on that occasion you’ve heard about, set her eyes on me—as well a woman might. She was grateful and that sufficed. This is often women’s weak spot: fond obligation is the start. She caused my sleepless nights, all my foolish carrying on, and seemed to welcome my sighs. Then, fool that I was, I considered myself the happy master of both her beauty and her estate.—Then when you came from Spain, you cast a spell on her and put an end to my happy love when it had only just begun. Yet I’ve kept Estela under careful watch—like Argos of the hundred eyes—\(^{45}\) and now I really am quite sure all her fickle changes only prove without a shadow of a doubt that she’s actually in love with me. And thus, Leonardo, if my pleas can sway a nobleman such as you, I beg of you to give me relief by courting Estela no more, since my suit came first and I’ve made such heroic efforts. If you do me this kindness now, your generosity and my gratitude will go down in history.

LEONOR

(Aside) Oh, you ingrate, you despicable man! A fine way for a nobleman to carry on! (Aloud) You’ve expressed your pain so keenly, Don Juan, that I only wish I could

---

\(^{45}\) A hundred-eyed giant from Greek mythology.
(Aside) rip your soul out (Aloud) set your mind at ease.
Time and again the Countess has said she would be mine, it’s true, and has no will beyond my own,
and all she does is nothing but a loving sacrifice for my sake.
Yet what does any of that matter, when my own soul is bound elsewhere
by other ties of love?
I only wish I’d loved Estela devotedly, faithfully,
just so I could help you out.
Yet I am of no use to you,
for my own sweet thoughts of love have me so beguiled that I’m in heaven above.
And so, Don Juan, it seems to me
I cannot do anything for you.

JUAN How could Estela have so little effect on you?

LEONOR If words cannot persuade you that I’m telling the truth, let this portrait serve as proof that I love another, full worthy of my devotion. 46

LEONOR takes out a small portrait

(Aside) Now, you ingrate,
I’ll be revenged for your scorn.

JUAN Heavens! What’s this?

LEONOR Take a look and tell me if this perfection, this elegance, this grace, this beauty…

46 Miniature portraits were luxury gifts exchanged by lovers in this period. “Leonardo” takes out one of these portraits to prove that he is in a relationship with Leonor.
JUAN I’m losing my mind!

LEONOR … could ever be forgotten for Estela’s sake.

JUAN (Aside) She’s turned me to stone.
It’s like looking upon the head of Medusa.
A basilisk before my eyes!
She’s taken my very life.

LEONOR (Aside) Who is he bargaining with now?
(Aloud) You seem surprised.

JUAN Oh heavens! It seems to me I’ve seen this lady before and that this portrait was once mine.
(Aside) My reason must surrender to the truth before my eyes.

LEONOR You must know
I’ve carried it with me from Spain.
It’s the portrait of a lady to whom I owe the glory of a most sweet endeavor, and whose delights, if I live,
will lead to the bonds of marriage.
That is why I’m in Brussels, for I cannot wed unless I first punish a wrong with force,
a crime with death.

JUAN (Aside) What’s happening to me?
How could I resist
when confronted with my dishonor?
Why did I not stop this talk of infamy?
What good is a life without honor?
And yet, did Leonor yield to him so easily?
Loyalty, pure faith reduced to infamy?
Yet it was done under the name of husband.\footnote{Marriage vows exchanged in private long had the force of an actual marriage, even after the Church began trying to enforce public unions instead.}

Leave me be, jealous thoughts.

I must forgive her.

Only I am to blame.

I abandoned her. I was the ingrate.

What am I to do amid such confusion?

(Aloud) Don Leonardo...

LEONOR

(Aside) The traitor seems to be coming around.

(Aloud) What’s this you say?

JUAN

(Aside) I don’t know what I’m saying— I burn in a jealous rage.

I’m lost in a labyrinth with no way out but death, for Leonor is no Ariadne.\footnote{In Greek mythology, Ariadne helped Theseus safely negotiate the Minotaur’s labyrinth.}

(Aloud) In this portrait I’ve seen my death.

LEONOR

(Aside) Oh, ungrateful fool, so blind, so distracted you don’t even recognize me!

What could be more foolish than to recognize the copy, but not the original?

Has deceit so blinded him he can’t see the truth before his very eyes?

JUAN

(Aside) This is unbearable.

(Aloud) What are your obligations to this lady?

LEONOR

I’ve earned her embrace and her favor— you can imagine the rest.

JUAN

(Aside) Undo me now, oh my mad thoughts. Now, outrageous sorrows, fill my soul!
Seize me now, body and mind!
Leonor was our shared misfortune.
No more niceties,
I must break my silence.
(Aloud) That woman, that monster, that prodigy of easy virtue!
I left her, yet now jealousy does what love could not.
Now I love her, and surrender to the arrows of that wingèd boy.
Yet even if I were to kill you,
I can find no way forward, for the wrong she’s done to me will ring in my ears forever.
Who could imagine that Leonor would stain her honor like that?

LEONOR  (Aside) He speaks against me, though no less in my favor.
He’s said all he knows,
but let’s tighten the screws a bit more.
(Aloud) So you are my rival, Don Juan?

JUAN   Yes, Leonardo.

LEONOR  Leonor never would say—perhaps out of respect for the Córdoba name, which would have been tarnished
by such disloyalty.
All she said was that I’d find you in Brussels, and that I’d learn the name from her letters.
Now that you’ve confessed, this is as good a time as any to kill you.

Enter FERNANDO, as LEONOR and JUAN pull out their swords

FERNANDO  (Aside) My cousin and Don Juan, at odds?
JUAN  Don Fernando!

LEONOR  You think he heard us?

JUAN  Who knows.

LEONOR  Well, not to put too fine a point on it,
       I’ll kill you, Don Juan.

JUAN  You say that so pointedly, Leonardo.

LEONOR  When I duel my courage rules, and I forget the finer points of art—
       the parries and the thrusts—though I know the famous swordmaster,
       Don Luis de Narváez.49

FERNANDO  (Aside) What’s this I see? What’s this I hear?
       (Aloud) Don Juan, Leonardo, what are you talking about?

LEONOR  The art of swordplay.

FERNANDO  And why are you so pale,
       Don Juan?

JUAN  Honor requires that we stop now.
       Find me later, Leonardo.

JUAN starts to exit

LEONOR  I will, for I must abide by the principles of your doctrine.
       (Aside) Oh, heavens! ¡Ah, cielos!

JUAN  (Aside) What is Fernando doing here?

LEONOR  (Aside) My brother, here, now?

49 Luis Pacheco de Narváez: Famous 17th century Spanish fencing master who wrote the Libro de las grandezas de la espada, which taught the art of fencing using the principles of geometry.
I can’t believe it!

JUAN I am headed this evening to the gardens of Armindo. You should come, too, if you wish, for a bit of practice.

LEONOR I’d like nothing more.

JUAN Are you staying here, Fernando?

FERNANDO Yes.

JUAN Goodbye, then. Are we agreed then, Don Leonardo?

LEONOR Agreed.

Exit JUAN

FERNANDO Is he gone?

LEONOR Yes.

FERNANDO Estela told me that Prince Ludovico courts her, and that she is obliged to Don Juan. And yet it seems to me that only you escape her general disdain—

LEONOR Stop.

FERNANDO I will stop. Now that you know, Leonardo, how will you respond to such favor? If not indifferent, then at least warm? (Aside) Lord knows how it hurts to serve as her go-between when I adore her so!

LEONOR Well, Fernando, if I have any claim to Estela’s love, I withdraw it now.
FERNANDO Have you gone mad?

LEONOR I’ve completely lost my mind.
(Aside) Will this afternoon never come?

FERNANDO Let me help you out.

LEONOR Not yet.
(Aside) I need to distract him somehow.
(Aloud) Come with me.

FERNANDO Willingly.

Exit FERNANDO and LEONOR, and enter TOMILLO

TOMILLO Ever since I drank that chocolate, or whatever it was Flora gave me, I’ve been in such a daze. I can’t keep my eyes open.

Enter FLORA

FLORA (Aside) Here’s Tomillo now. Hasn’t the chocolate taken effect yet?

TOMILLO To hell with it all. I’ll just lie down here for a little while.

He lies down

Oh, the ground is so nice and soft!
Like it was made to break my bones.
Alright, enough is enough.
I can’t resist.
Sleep, I surrender to you.

He falls asleep

FLORA Now he’s sleeping like a log—the drink worked like a charm.
Let’s have a look at what relics
this saint has on him.\textsuperscript{50}

\textit{She begins emptying his pockets}

Let’s see. Here is a mustache comb—it must be four hundred years old.
This here appears to be a handkerchief—
once so white, so clean, and now so ruined by tobacco and phlegm!
Here’s his dice made of bones—a holy relic! And a deck of cards—his sacred book of prayers and devotions.
I can’t find the purse,
and I don’t think I will,
among so much hallowed junk.
What’s this? A snuff box of horn.
A fine material,
worthy of its owner.\textsuperscript{51}
Men and the things they go for!
I know a man who inhaled more dust than snuff with every snort.
I’ll turn him over and examine him again.

\textit{She turns him over}

He sure is heavy, the bastard!
By all the saints in heaven,
I hope he doesn’t wake up!
Some tangled silk and a cigar—is there no vice this dirty louse has not picked up? Ah, this must be the precious purse, most worthy of my service and devotions.
Jesus, what is he wearing!
One, two, three, four, five,

\textsuperscript{50} As Flora digs through Tomillo’s pockets to rob him, she ironically refers to the old junk in his pockets as holy relics. The purse she eventually finds could either be the purse he received from Fernando at the beginning of the play or the one Estela gave him in exchange for information.

\textsuperscript{51} Horn, or “cuerno” is a play on the term for a cuckold, “cornudo.”
six, seven, eight layers of rags.
I will never be done counting.

She finds the purse and empties it

Ah yes, here you are,
you sweet repository of hope and escudos!\(^{52}\)
How I revere you!
I take you into my heart,
sacred treasury of that rich metal that tempted Midas and Croesus.\(^{53}\) I’ll take my leave while he sleeps and leave him those other jewels to look after when he awakes.

Exit FLORA and enter RIBETE

RIBETE
Leonor is furious
and she won’t say why.
She won’t listen,
and nothing will calm her down.
She did not tell me that she was meeting Don Juan in the gardens this evening,
I don’t know what for.
My God! / ¡Válgame Dios! What could it be?
I will follow her—this won’t end well.

TOMILLO
How I’ve slept…
It felt like a year,
and still I cannot wake up.
I’ll just roll to the other side.

RIBETE
This poor fool’s drunk as a skunk.

TOMILLO
Hush.

RIBETE
Tomillo! Are you asleep?

\(^{52}\) Escudo: Spanish coin.
\(^{53}\) Midas and Croesus: Greek mythological figures associated with great wealth and a tragic end.
TOMILLO No.

RIBETE Dreaming, then?

TOMILLO No, not that either. This fool wakes me, and then asks if I’m asleep.

RIBETE Is all this junk yours?

TOMILLO sits up

TOMILLO No clue. What’s this? My purse!

He searches around frantically

RIBETE Where did you leave it?

TOMILLO I don’t know.

RIBETE Hold on. Don’t fret. Let’s look for it.

TOMILLO What’s the point? I did not guard it well, and so I’ve been replaced by a more able protector. Oh, my dear purse!

RIBETE You could call for it in song.

TOMILLO “Nero, you sit on high and gaze / While Rome’s consumed in deadly blaze.”

RIBETE puts up a hand to stop him, and they scuffle

Let us part in harmony, Ribete.

54 Verses from a popular song that appears in La Celestina and is referenced in works by Lope de Vega and Cervantes.
RIBETE What? That’s it?
I’ll get you, by God!
(Aside) He’s not even worth it.
(Aloud) Don’t you know who I am?

TOMILLO I know you well.
Oh, my escudos!

RIBETE I better leave now before I do something I regret.
I must make sure
Leonor is all right.

Exit RIBETE

TOMILLO It was Flora who gave me this fright.
She’s taken her revenge on me.

Exit TOMILLO and enter JUAN

JUAN I can find no rest in my mad confusion for reason is no match for jealousy’s relentless stings.
There’s no happy medium
in a state such as this.
I’m paying now for my ingratitude, and there’s no way forth but death.
There’s honor in dying, yes,
for in these circumstances an honorable death is better than a life of disrepute.
This is well reasoned.
Oh, honor, there’s no respite from jealousy and despair!

Enter LEONOR

LEONOR Forgive my delay: Estela has kept me, and would not let me leave her side.

JUAN Her love does not trouble me—my honor is my only concern.
I’ve called you here, Leonardo,
so we can die at each other’s hands. 2470

LEONOR  That is my hope too, Don Juan.

Enter RIBETE at the door

RIBETE  (Aside) Such tender words!
What am I waiting for?
My fears are confirmed.
Leonor’s brother is with Estela— 2475
I must find him right away.
Leonor, your enterprise must come to an end.

Exit RIBETE

LEONOR  On this day, Don Juan, my disgrace will end—by God! / ¡por Dios!
Your death will finally free me 2480

to marry the one I love.

JUAN  That may indeed be your good fortune,
but all misfortune is mine.
Even if my sword struck you first,
and you died soon after, 2485
none of it would matter.
My grave injury, this gross dishonor, would not go away.
Having endured such shame,
I could never marry Leonor 2490 who so lightly shared her favors with you, having once been mine.
And if you should kill me and marry her,
you’d be marrying my widow.
Joy of joys, indeed, 2495
but you needn’t worry—
none of that will happen.
I will kill you now,
and you must try to kill me, 2500
so that as our lives meet their end, so will my suffering and your hopes for happiness.
LEONOR

Don Juan,
I want to kill you, not to die not when I plan to enjoy that divine prize
But enough of this chatter—let our swords do the talking.

JUAN
To kill and be killed:
that’s the best I can hope for.

FERNANDO and LUDOVICO enter and draw their swords

FERNANDO
My lord, Ribete has asked me to come without delay,
for Don Juan and Leonardo are dueling.
What’s all this?

LUDOVICO
Gentlemen, two friends with their swords unsheathed?

FERNANDO
I’m here in the nick of time.

JUAN
Can this be true?
(Aside) Nothing ever goes my way!
Oh, ungracious fortune!
Must this too happen to me?

FERNANDO
Ah, you must be testing your swords!
Is this a drill?
Have you been studying that manual—what is it called? “Mastering the Sword”?— with its recommendations on that most noble art?
Don Juan, you’re not quarreling with my cousin?
Is this friendship, I ask you?

JUAN
(Aside) See what you’ve forced me to, Leonor!

FERNANDO
He is my own blood, my kin;
we share the same forefathers,
and I am, of course, your friend.
None of this matters to you?
Have you suffered a wrong so great you no longer care for who I am?
And you, dear cousin,
how can you be so foolish and behave so rashly?
Have you lost your mind?

LEONOR
I only do what I must.
You insult my just cause without reason.

FERNANDO
Tell me, then, what’s this about?

LEONOR
Don Juan should say.

JUAN
(Aside) How could I speak plainly when I have been wronged and the danger is clear?

FERNANDO
What? Will you not respond?

JUAN
(Aside) How could the heavens permit this!
(Aloud) Let Leonardo state the cause.
(Aside) This is killing me.

LEONOR
Oh, you want me to announce all of your fickle misdeeds?
Then listen closely,
Fernando and Ludovico:
Dear cousin, as you’ve told me,
Don Juan has already shared with you
the secrets of his love, his fickleness, and how he came to be here,
and what has transpired since:
how he served Estela
and wooed her dishonorably.
Listen now and you will hear the worst part of all.
Doña Leonor de Ribera, your sister, admired by all, sought by countless noble suitors—
how can I put this…

FERNANDO
Go on, Leonardo, get to the point.
JUAN  Wait, wait, Leonardo.
(Aside) Can this be true?
Could she be Fernando’s sister?

LEONOR  It was your sister, Doña Leonor, who was the cause of Don Juan’s misdeeds.

JUAN  (Aside) Now Fortune has played its hand in full.

FERNANDO  Go on, go on,
though I fear I may lack the wits and the patience to hear you out.
(Aside) Unworthy gentleman, ingrate, and to think that you might have married Estela!

LEONOR  Don Juan promised to marry her—the excuse that lies behind so much innocence undone.
But then he left her, the ingrate, just as I came to love her with such deep devotion that it took my breath away.
My very life was warmed
by the sweet fire of Leonor’s beauty, though she burned at the injustice of Don Juan’s betrayal.
And swearing me first to secrecy—lovers will swear anything—she told me her pitiful story while her eyes shed copious pearls.
So I, a faithful lover, promised to avenge her wrongs
by killing Don Juan, and, having laid the story to rest through a duel, to marry her myself.
And marry her I shall,
Don Fernando, unless I die
at the hands of my enemy.
I came to Flanders,
knowing he was in Brussels.
You see, I must avenge this wrong.
Noble as I am, I seek only honor.
It is mine now, as is Leonor.

JUAN

By heavens, / ¡Vive el cielo! that will never be!

FERNANDO

Can such confusion be possible?
Today I lose both life and honor!
Ah, wanton sister! Don Juan, is this how you repay my friendship?

JUAN

(Aside) I am too ashamed to look at him.
(Aloud) Had I known she was your sister...

FERNANDO

(to JUAN) What would you have done?
(to LUDOVICO) I cannot find a way out of this, Ludovico.

LEONOR

I adore her.

JUAN

I love her.

LEONOR

(Aside) Isn’t that nice!

JUAN

(Aside) Isn’t this awful!

LEONOR

(Aside) Isn’t this more like it?

JUAN

(Aside) Isn’t this cause for jealousy!
(Aloud) I cannot marry
Doña Leonor, it’s true,
even if Leonardo were to be killed.
I will die first.
Oh, if only she had kept her honor!

FERNANDO

I am lost in a labyrinth!
Don Juan has a point, a good one,
for how can I marry her to Leonardo,
when Don Juan still lives?
That’s it. We must all kill each other.
I can see no other way out.

LUDOVICO

By God, / ¡Por Dios! neither do I!
And that would be so barbaric and violent.

LEONOR  So had Leonor not broken the ties between you, had she not accepted my love, would you still love her?  2645

JUAN       I would adore her.

LEONOR  Well, you’ll see Leonor soon enough, and perhaps you’ll get your just deserts.

JUAN       Where is she?

LEONOR  In Brussels.  2650

JUAN       What?

LEONOR  Wait here a moment.

Exit LEONOR and enter ESTELA, LISARDA, FLORA, RIBETE, and TOMILLO

ESTELA  Is Don Leonardo really at odds with Don Juan?

RIBETE  As far as I can tell.  2655

TOMILLO  Oh, my purse and my escudos!

LISARDA  Leonardo is not with them.

ESTELA  Gentlemen, what has happened here?

FERNANDO  I do not know what to say,
I am speechless.  2660

LISARDA  Ludovico, listen.

LUDOVICO  (Aside) I cannot bear the sight of Estela, having heard her disdainful scorn with my own ears.
(Aloud) What is that you say, beautiful Lisarda?  2665
LISARDA  What happened to Don Leonardo?
Where is he?

LUDOVICO  Come over here and I’ll tell you.

FERNANDO  (Aside) If only this could have been prevented!
Today I must either redeem my honor or die in the attempt.
Oh, sister, I am losing my mind!

TOMILLO  Flora, come here for a moment.

FLORA  Where, nitwit?

TOMILLO  Ribete...

RIBETE  What is going on?

TOMILLO  I am such an ass.

RIBETE  (Aside) Where is Leonor?
She’s gotten into such a bind!

Enter LEONOR, dressed as an elegant lady

LEONOR  Brother, Prince, husband, I will forgive you for your low opinion of my love, for now you’ll see how I’ve come here, constant and resolute…

RIBETE  What is this?

LEONOR  ...from Spain all the way to Flanders, risking death time and again:
first, as I fought with Ludovico beneath Estela’s window, and wounded my own husband, and today, when only my respect for the crown stayed my hand, confusing my own brother with extraordinary schemes, and just now, daring and brave, ready to take Don Juan’s life to regain my chaste honor.
And had he not shown regret,
by God, I would have done it, emboldened by my courage to right a woman’s wrongs.
I was Leonardo, and now am Leonor again. Will you love me?

JUAN  I will adore you.

RIBETE  And so Leonor’s scheming has come to an end.

FERNANDO  Sister, I am amazed at such good fortune.

LUDOVICO  Could there be a happier ending?

ESTELA  Leonardo, have you been deceiving me?

LEONOR  I had no choice, Estela.

ESTELA  Let us be sisters then, beautiful Leonor.
Fernando, give me your hand
as my husband and lord.

FERNANDO  We have Leonor to thank for this happiness. I am yours.

LUDOVICO  Lovely Lisarda, now that I’ve lost Estela, let me find solace in your beauty.
Give me your hand.

LISARDA  I give you my hand and my soul.

RIBETE  Flora, they are three for three.
But there’s only you left for the two of us.
No, we’ll leave you to the wolves,
you little lost lamb.
ESTELA  I’ll give her to you,
along with six thousand escudos.

RIBETE  I’ll accept for the escudos.
The fool who takes such a wife will surely need them.

TOMILLO  And me—I’ve lost everything—
Flora, purse and escudos.

LEONOR  And so ends, wise senate,
Its creator, a modest woman, begs you to forgive its faults.
